Walker, Sarah. [Maiden name, Breedlove.] b. at Delta, La., Dec. 23, 1867; d. at Irvington-on-the-Hudson, N.Y., May 25, 1919. American Negro merchant and manufacturer. She devised (1905) a formula for a preparation which straightened wiry hair; its commercial exploitation brought her a fortune, the larger part of which was left to charitable and educational institutions at her death.

Walker, Sears Cook. b. at Wilmington, Mass., March 23, 1805; d. at Cincinnati, Ohio, Jan. 30, 1853. American astronomer and mathematician. Graduated (1825) from Harvard, he worked as a teacher and insurance actuary, devoting his leisure time to astronomical investigation. By 1845, when he joined the astronomical staff of the U.S. Naval Observatory at Washington, D.C., he was recognized as one of the leading scientists in the field. He served (1847-53) as head of the computations of geographical longitude for the U.S. Coast Survey. His investigation of discrepancies in the observations of lunar culminations and occultations led him to adopt the electric telegraph as the most efficient means of determining the longitude of any given place from a prime meridian. He also evolved the method, later known as the American system, of telegraphing the transits of stars, and applied the graphic recording of time results to the registration of time observations for general astronomical uses.

Walker, Stuart. b. at Augusta, Ky., March 4, 1888; d. at Beverly Hills, Calif., March 13, 1941. American playwright and theatrical producer. Associated (1909-14) with David Belasco as reader, actor, and stage manager, he served as director of repertory companies at Indianapolis (1917-23, 1926-28) and Cincinnati (1922-29), and led (1929-34) the Stuart Walker Repertory Company at Cincinnati. He was a director (1931-34) and a producer (1936-41) at Hollywood. The originator of the "portmanteau theater," he was the author of two series of portmanteau plays (1917-19), including the popular Size Who Pass While the Lentils Boil, Five Flights Up (1922), and The King's Great Aunt Sits on the Floor (1923).

Walker, Thomas Barlow. b. at Xenia, Ohio, Feb. 1, 1840; d. July 28, 1928. American lumber magnate and art collector. By 1900, when he began to retire from many of his business ventures, he had accumulated a large fortune as one of the most prominent timber owners in the U.S., holding properties in Minnesota and California. His large collection of paintings and art objects formed the basis of the Walker Art Gallery at Minneapolis, Minn., housed in his former home. He was a founder of the Minneapolis Society of Fine Arts, of which he was president (1888-93), and organized (1925) the Walker Foundation.

Walker, Walton Harris. b. at Belton, Tex., Dec. 3, 1889; d. near Seoul, Korea, Dec. 23, 1950. American soldier. Commissioned in 1912, he served in the expedition (1914) to Veracruz, Mexico, and fought (1918-19) at St.-Mihiel and in the Meuse-Argonne battle in France. He served in the army of occupation in Germany and later was on duty in China (1930-33). An armored corps commander, he fought under George S. Patton, Jr., and led the dash of U.S. forces to Linz, Austria (1945); it was his troops who liberated the Buchenwald prison camp. He headed commands in the U.S. from 1945 to 1948 and in 1948 assumed command of the 8th army in the Far East. When the Republic of Korea was invaded in 1950, Walker was put in command of the ground forces attempting to hold back the attack from the north. He commanded in the retreat of the United Nations forces to the pocket around Pusan, and later in 1950 again successfully extricated his troops when the Chinese armies entered the war from Manchuria.

Walker, William. b. at Nashville, Tenn., May 8, 1824; d. at Trujillo, Honduras, Sept. 12, 1860. American adventurer. He was a journalist and lawyer in California. In 1853, with 170 followers, he invaded Lower California and Sonora and proclaimed a republic in 1854. Driven back across the border by Mexican troops, he was tried at San Francisco (May, 1854) for violation of the neutrality laws, but was acquitted. Taking advantage of disturbed conditions in Nicaragua, he entered that country with 58 men in June, 1855, and joined the rebel faction. At first unsuccessful, he finally defeated Guardiola (September 3) and took the capital, Granada. Corral submitted to him. Walker acknowledged Rivas as president and Corral as minister of war, reserving for himself the title of commander in chief. A few days later he brought charges against Corral, who was tried and shot. In July, 1856, he was elected president by the votes of departments which were controlled by his army. Among his many arbitrary acts was a decree restoring slavery, an act calculated to gain sympathy for his regime among the proslavery element in the U.S.; in fact, his government was almost immediately recognized by Pierce's administration and he became to some extent a popular hero in the U.S. Costa Rica, and eventually all the Central American states, backed by Cornelius Vanderbilt, whose ships had been confiscated by Walker, joined with the Nicaraguan legitimists against him. After July, 1856, he was repeatedly defeated and was forced to abandon Granada, which he burned in December. On May 1, 1857, he took refuge on a U.S. vessel, which carried him to Panama. He made two attempts to recover the country, but was foiled by the intervention of the U.S. In August, 1860, he invaded Honduras, but was captured in September by a British vessel, delivered to the Honduras authorities, and by them tried and shot. He published The War in Nicaragua (1853).

Walker, William Hultz. b. at Pittsburgh, Pa., April 7, 1869; d. July 9, 1934. American industrial and chemical engineer. He was professor (1894-1921) of chemical engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and a lecturer (1905-08) on industrial chemistry at Harvard. Noted for the production of art glass and sterling silver, he did research on the chemistry of cellulose as applied to industry, the prevention of corrosion on iron and steel, and the technology of petroleum, and also invented several industrial processes.

Wallace, Alfred Russel. b. at Usk, Monmouthshire, England, Jan. 8, 1823; d. at Broadstone, Dorset, England, Nov. 7, 1913. English scientist, independent discoverer of the theory of natural selection. He was influenced by the naturalist, Henry Walter Bates, whom he accompanied (April, 1848-March, 1850) on an exploring trip to the Amazon, and by T. R. Malthus' book, On Population. While in the Malay Archipelago (1854-62), working independently of Charles Darwin, he discovered the principle of natural selection, reaching the same conclusions that Darwin had formulated and was ready to announce. Wallace sent a statement of his views to Darwin; with each worker insisting on giving credit to the other, the problem was solved by the publication of a joint paper, read (July 1, 1858) before the Linnean Society of London, in which the theory was presented as a joint discovery. Wallace distinguished two regions in the East Indies, separated by a narrow belt of water (called Wallace's Line), with distinct differences in animal life on either side of the line. Author of Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro and Palm Trees of the Amazon (both 1853), The Malay Archipelago (1869), Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection (1870), On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism (1875), Geographical Distribution of Animals (1876), Tropical Nature (1878), Island Life (1880), Land Nationalization (1882), Darwinism (1889), The Ice Age and Its Work (1894), Method of Organic Evolution (1896), Vaccination—A Delusion (1898), Man's Place in the Universe (1903), My Life (1905), Is Mars Habitable? (1907), The World of Life (1910), Social Environment and Moral Progress (1912), and The Revolt of Democracy (1913).

Wallace, Henry. b. near West Newton, Pa., March 19, 1836; d. Feb. 22, 1916. American agricultural author, editor, and publisher. He was ordained (1862) as a United Presbyterian preacher, and served in pastorates until 1877, when for reasons of health he moved to Iowa. He served as contributing editor of the Iowa Homestead and with his two sons, Henry Cantwell Wallace and John P. Wallace, acquired (1895) Wallace's Farm and Dairy (later Wallace's Farmer), serving as its editor until the time of his death. Author of The Doctrines of the Plymouth Brethren (1878), Clover Culture (1892), Uncle Henry's Letters to the Farm Boy (1897), Letters to the Farm Folks (1915), and Uncle Henry's Own Story of His Life (3 vols., 1917-19).

Wallace, Henry Agard. b. in Adair County, Iowa, Oct. 7, 1888—; American agriculturist, public administrator, and politician, U.S. secretary of agriculture (1933-40), Vice-President of the United States (1941-45), and U.S. secretary of commerce (1945-46); son of Henry Cantwell Wallace. In 1910 he became associate editor of Wallace's Farmer, of which he became editor, continuing in that post after the journal was merged (1929) with the Iowa Homestead. His experiments in corn growing yielded several valuable hybrids. He became (1933) secretary of agriculture in President Franklin D. Roosevelt's cabinet, and in this capacity was responsible for administering the AAA and other agricultural reforms initiated under the New Deal. Among his innovations was the "ever-normal granary" by which quotas in staple crops were established and provision made for surplus storage to prevent wide fluctuation in prices. He was nominated (1940) vice-presidential candidate at the Chicago Democratic national convention. During World War II he made good-will tours to South America and the U.S.S.R. After he was succeeded as vice-president by Harry S. Truman, he became (March 2, 1945) U.S. secretary of agriculture. His outspoken position as an opponent of the Baruch plan for atomic energy control and his repeated declarations of his belief that the U.S. could achieve a political understanding with Russia were climaxed by a speech (Sept. 12, 1946) delivered at Madison Square Garden, New York, in which he strongly criticized the foreign policy of the Truman administration. Shortly thereafter he was dismissed from his cabinet post. He was editor (1946-48) and then contributing editor of the New Republic and in 1948 was presidential candidate of the newly formed Progressive Party, which he left in 1950 because of its pro-Russian attitude on the Korean War. He is the author of Agricultural Prices (1920), Corn and Corn Growing (1923; subsequently revised; 4th ed., 1937), Correlation and Machine Calculation (1924), America Must Choose (1934), Statesmanship and Religion (1934), New Frontiers (1934), Whose Constitution? (1936), Technology, Corporations, and the General Welfare (1937), Paths to Plenty (1938, later revised as Price of Freedom, 1940), The American Choice (1940), The Century of the Common Man (1943), Democracy Reborn (1944), Our Job in the Pacific (1944), Sixty Million Jobs (1945), The Fight for Peace (1946), Soviet Asia Mission (in collaboration with Andrew J. Steiger, 1946), and Toward World Peace (1948). See The Wallaces of Iowa, by Russell Lord (1947).

He served in Hungary under the Emperor Rudolf II, and was made duke of Friedland in 1625. He raised an army for the Imperialist service in 1625, defeated Peter Ernst Mansfeld at the bridge of Dessau (April 25, 1626), invaded Hungary and won Silesia for the Imperialists in 1627, besieged Stralsund unsuccessfully in 1628, and was removed from his command in 1630 because of the hostility of the nobility to his policies of centering all on the empire at the expense of the vassal princes, and temporarily retired. He resumed command by invitation of the emperor in the spring of 1632 although Wallenstein by then was alienated from the idea of a Germany dominated by the League. He fought against the Swedes and lost (1632) the battle of Lützen at which Gustavus Adolphus was killed. He failed to attempt a counterblow and the emperor, Ferdinand II, convinced that he was meditating treachery, removed him from his command (January, 1634), and outlawed him. Wallenstein was in the act of going over to the Swedes (who were on the borders of Bohemia) when he was murdered by some of his officers.

Waller (wól'ér), Edmund. b. at Colshill, Hertfordshire, England, March 3, 1606; d. at Beaconsfield, England, Oct. 21, 1687. English poet. He entered Parliament in 1621, when he was only 16. In 1631 he married a rich woman, found himself in legal difficulties because of the marriage, and was fined; his wife died in 1634. He was a member of the Long Parliament and a supporter of the king, in whose favor he concocted the "Waller Plot" in 1643, a plan to keep London loyal to the king; the plot was discovered and Waller gave evidence against his companions, who were executed while his own punishment was a fine and banishment. He lived in France, traveled through Switzerland and Italy with John Evelyn, and returned (1652) to England after Parliament revoked the sentence of banishment. After the Restoration he again sat in Parliament (1661-87). Among his poems are a panegyric on Cromwell, a lament for Cromwell's death, congratulations on Charles II's return, a number of early poems to "Sacharissa" (Lady Dorothy Sidney, whom he wooed after his first wife's death), a group of lyrics including Go, Lovely Rose and On a Girdle, the longer St. James's Park (1661), and Divine Poems (1685). Waller's poetry is not marked by warmth but by an elegance that covers his lack of originality; he is credited with popularizing the heroic couplet.

Waller, Sir William. b. c.1597; d. Sept. 19, 1668. English general. He served in the Thirty Years' War, was second in command of the Parliamentary forces under Robert Devereux, 3rd Earl of Essex in 1642, reduced Portsmouth in 1642, was defeated near Bath and near Devizes in 1643, and gained a victory at Cheriton in 1644. He was defeated at Cropredy Bridge in 1644, served at Newbury, and was deprived of his command in 1645 under the Self-Denying Ordinance. It was Waller who suggested the New Model army. He was a Presbyterian and anti-army leader in Parliament, was expelled for treason in 1647, returned and was expelled in Pride's Purge in 1648, and was in prison a number of times between then and 1659. He was a member of the council of state and of the convention parliament in 1660, but retired soon afterward.

Walpole, Horace (or Horatio). [Title, 4th Earl of Orford.] b. at London, Oct. 5, 1717; d. there, March 2, 1797. English author; third surviving son of Sir Robert Walpole. He was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge. On leaving Cambridge he traveled (1739-41) with Thomas Gray in France and Italy. In 1741 he was elected to Parliament, where he remained until 1768. His political career was largely devoted to furthering the interests of his cousin, Henry Seymour Conway. His income, which averaged about 5,000 pounds a year, came from several sinecures to which he had been appointed by his father. In 1747 he moved to a small house, Strawberry Hill (on the Thames near Twickenham), which he began to remodel in 1749 in the neo-Gothic style; his last addition was built in 1790. On Dec. 5, 1791, he succeeded as 4th Earl of Orford. Strawberry Hill is a landmark in English taste, since it influenced (dubiously) architectural style in the English-speaking world for upwards of a century and a half. Walpole, an ardent collector, filled his house with pictures, books, and curiosities that made it one of the showplaces of England. The contents of Strawberry Hill were sold at auction in 1842 in two celebrated sales that took 32 days. In 1757 Walpole opened the Strawberry Hill Press with Gray's two Pindaric Odes. This was perhaps the most famous private press ever to be operated in England. Thirty-four books of varying size and importance were printed at it and 77 single sheets of verses, title pages, and the like. Walpole was the author of five pioneer works, Aedes Walpolianae (1747), which was a description of his father's great collection of pictures at Houghton in Norfolk, A Catalogue of the Royal and Noble Authors of England (1758), Anecdotes of Painting in England (1763-71), a romance entitled The Castle of Otranto (1765), and Historic Doubts on the Life and Reign of Richard III (1768). Though The Castle of Otranto was immensely popular for upwards of a century as the first "Gothic romance," Walpole's literary fame today depends mostly upon his letters, which are regarded as the best in the language. They and his memoirs of his times, which he wrote secretly from 1751 to 1791 and which he arranged to be published many years after his death, furnish the fullest picture we have of 18th-century life in England. There have been many editions of Walpole's letters, the first being included in The Works of Lord Orford (1798). The two most recent are those of Paget and Helen Toynbee (19 vols., 1903-26), and the Yale Edition of Horace Walpole's Correspondence, edited by W. S. Lewis, which were in 1950 in progress of publication.

Walpole, Sir Robert. [Title: 1st Earl of Orford; nicknamed "Robin Bluestring" and "The Grand Corrupter".] b. at Houghton, Norfolk, England, Aug. 26, 1676; d. there, March 18, 1745. English statesman. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, entered Parliament in 1701, became a member of the council to Prince George in 1705 and secretary at war in 1708, and became one of the Whig leaders. He was treasurer of the navy and manager of the Sacheverell impeachment in 1710, was accused of corruption, expelled from Parliament, and sent to the Tower in 1712, was returned to Parliament in 1713, became paymaster general in 1714, and was prime minister (first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer) 1715-17. In 1717 he worked out a sinking fund to reduce the national debt. Walpole had warned of the danger of the South Sea speculation; he became paymaster general in 1720, and, on the breaking of the South Sea Bubble (1720), was called to take charge of the desperate financial situation. He was again first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer in 1721 and from then until 1742 was the leading political figure in England, actually the first prime minister in the modern sense. With Charles Townshend as secretary of state he set forth on a policy directed toward building prosperity while avoiding war. Townshend resigned in 1730 after a quarrel with Walpole, and thereafter he stood alone. He reduced duties, paid out subsidies, cut the land tax, and in general attempted to base the economy on a free flow of goods. He shifted the center of gravity in government from the House of Lords to the House of Commons, began the trend of government from the hands of the king to those of the prime minister, and made the prime minister actual chief of the government by a calculated policy of rewards and punishments based on loyalty. Eventually his methods led to a united front of opposition to him and, first forced into the War of the Austrian Succession (1739) by the war party and then criticized for the lack of military success, he resigned in 1742.

Walpole, Sir Spencer. b. at London, Feb. 6, 1839; d. in Sussex, England, July 7, 1907. English government official, essayist, and historian. He was inspector of fisheries for England and Wales, governor (1882-93) of the Isle of Man, and secretary (1893-99) to the post office. Walsingham, Sir Francis. b. at Chislehurst, Kent, England, c1530; d. at London, April 6, 1590. English statesman. He entered Parliament in 1559, was ambassador to France (1570-73), was made secretary of state in 1573, and was sent on embassies to the Netherlands (1578), to France (1581), and to Scotland (1583). He attempted unsuccessfully to bring about an anti-Spanish alliance with France. Walsingham built up a very efficient spy system and uncovered (1586) the Babington plot, which led to the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots. He also gave advance warning (1587) of the preparations for the Spanish Armada, but here, as in other things, was faced with the inertia of Elizabeth and her advisers. He was also a patron of learning. His daughter Frances (who afterward married Robert Devereux, 2nd Earl of Essex) had married Sir Philip Sidney and Walsingham assumed Sidney's debts; as a result, since he was seldom the recipient of Elizabeth's gifts, Walsingham died still burdened with debt.

Walter (vål'tér). Eugene. b. at Cleveland, Ohio, Nov. 27, 1874; d. at Hollywood, Calif., Sept. 26, 1941. American playwright. His plays include Paid in Full (1906), The Wolf (1907), The Easiest Way (1908), and The Assassin (1910). He also dramatized the novels The Trail of the Lonesome Pine and The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come by John Fox.

Walter, John. b. 1739; d. at Teddington, Middlesex, England, Nov. 16, 1812. English publisher, first proprietor of the London Times. In 1782 he bought Henry Johnson's two patents for "logography" (a scheme for using types containing entire words instead of single letters in printing). To introduce the invention he established The London Daily Universal Register, in January, 1785. The invention failed, but the paper became (Jan. 1, 1788) the London Times.

Walter, John. b. probably at Battersea, London, Feb. 23, 1776; d. at London, July 28, 1847. English journalist; son of John Walter (1739–1812). He served as comanager (1797–1803), manager (1803 et seq.), editor (1803–10), and coeditor (1811 et seq.), with John Stoddart, Thomas Barnes, and John Thaddeus Delane of the London Times. He was a member of Parliament (1832–37, 1841). Noted for his opposition (1834, 1837) to the English and Irish poor laws, he frequently offended the government, suffering financial loss as a result by his frank and independent criticism of policy, but at the same time building the reputation of his newspaper. He was the first (1805) to send special correspondents abroad to report foreign news and the first to feature the leading article.

Walter, John. b. at Printing House Square, London, 1818; d. at Bear Wood, Berkshire, England, Nov. 3, 1894. English journalist; son of John Walter (1776–1847). He was associated (1840–47) with the London Times, and its chief owner (1847 et seq.); John Thaddeus Delane, Thomas Chenerly, and George Earle Buckle were editors during his management. He was a member of Parliament (1847–65, 1868–85). He devised and introduced (1869) the Walter printing press, enabling one machine to turn out 12,000 copies an hour.

Walter, Lucy. [Also: Mrs. Barlow; surnamed also Walters and Waters.] b. in Wales, c1630; d. 1658. Mistress of Charles II of England when he was in exile at The Hague, and mother by him of James Scott, Duke of Monmouth, rival of James II for the English throne. Both before and after her liaison with the future king, which ended in 1651, she was of promiscuous habits.

Walter, Master. Hunchback in James Sheridan Knowles's The Hunchback. He is the guardian of Julia, and is discovered to be her father.

Walter, Thomas Ustick. b. at Philadelphia, Sept. 4, 1804; d. there, Oct. 30, 1887. American architect. He designed Girard College, at Philadelphia, in 1833, and by appointment of President Millard Fillmore supervised Robert Mills as architect of the U.S. Capitol at Washington, June 10, 1851. To the old building of Charles Bulfinch he added the two wings for the Senate and the House of Representatives. He rebuilt the western front, added the library, and in 1855 began the new dome. Suspension of work on the Capitol was ordered in 1861, but the contractors continued until 1865, when the building was completed and Walter retired.

Walter of Coventry (kuv'en.tri). One of the most renowned of medieval builders in England. In 1187 he probably had the entire direction of the construction of Chichester cathedral (consecrated 1199). The palace and cloisters are attributed to him. He is highly praised by Matthew Paris. He built many edifices in the reigns of Henry II, Richard I, and John.

Walters (vål'térz). City in SW Oklahoma, county seat of Cotton County. 2,743 (1950).

Walters, Henry. b. at Baltimore, Sept. 26, 1848; d. at New York, Nov. 30, 1931. American railroad magnate and art collector; son of William Thompson Walters. He was connected with his father's enterprise, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, of which he became (1889) vice-president and general manager. He enlarged the art collection assembled by his father, and in 1909 deposited it in a new gallery constructed by him at Baltimore and left to that city at his death.

Walters, John. b. 1759; d. at Efenechtyd, Wales, June 28, 1789. Welsh poet and translator. Author of sermons, Translated Specimens of Welsh Poetry in English Verse (1772), Ode on the Immortality of the Soul (1776), Life, an Elegy (1776), and Poems with Notes (1780). At the request of the Society of Royal British Bowmen, he edited (1778) a reprint of Toxophilus, Roger Ascham's famous work on archery. His Poems with Notes is commonly called Bodleian Poems, for they were composed while the author was an Oxford student and an assistant librarian at the Bodleian Library.

Walters, William Thompson. b. at Liverpool, Pa., May 23, 1820; d. Nov. 22, 1894. American merchant, railroad executive, and art collector. Entering (1841) the produce commission business at Baltimore, he later became interested in railroad development in the South and was instrumental in reorganizing the Southern roads in the chaotic period after the Civil War. He amassed an art collection which, with the additions made by his son, later comprised the Walters Art Gallery at Baltimore.

masterful composition of its type but is the only form in which the saga of the Visigothic hero, Walter of Aquitaine, has been preserved; the fragmentary Old English Waldere belongs to the same cycle of story. Victor von Scheffel incorporated a German translation of it in his novel Ekkehard (1855).

Walther (vāl'tēr), Carl Ferdinand Wilhelm. b. at Lanenshusdorf, near Waldenburg, Saxony, Germany, Oct. 25, 1811; d. at St. Louis, Mo., May 7, 1887. American Lutheran clergyman. He arrived (1839) in the U.S. with a group of German religious settlers who established an independent Christian community in Perry County, Mo., and later in the same year helped found a school at Altenburg; upon its removal (1850) to St. Louis, when it became known as the Concordia Theological Seminary, he became professor of theology at that institution. A supporter of strict confessional Lutheranism, he espoused this view in lively theological controversy and in numerous works published in the German language. He was one of the leading figures in the organization (1847) of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other states, and was its president (1847-50, 1864-78).

Walther von der Vogelweide (vāl'tēr fon der fō'gel.vi.de). b. probably in Austria (date unknown); d. at Würzburg, Germany, after 1227. Middle High German lyric poet, the greatest of the period. He was of noble family, as his title "Herr" indicates, but poor. His youth was spent at Vienna, at the court of Duke Frederick I. After the death of his patron in 1198, he lived the life of a wandering singer, and traveled through a great part of Germany and the countries adjoining. He was not only with the Babenberg princes in Austria, whither he subsequently returned, but also at the courts of Thuringia, Meissen, Bavaria, and Carinthia; and in turn was with the emperors Philip of Swabia, Otto IV, and Frederick II. The last-named gave him a fief, it is supposed at Würzburg. His career as a poet began about 1187; the last poem which can be dated is a song in encouragement of the crusade (the fifth Crusade) of Frederick II in 1227. His poems are love songs, political songs or Sprüche, and religious songs, the last written in his later years. He is the principal minnesinger and the most gifted lyric poet of medieval Germany.

Wandering Jew. In medieval legend (specifically according to a story by Matthew Paris, dating from the 13th century) a servant of Pilate, by name Cartaphilus, who gave Jesus a blow when he was led out of the palace to execution. In a later story he was a cobbler, named Ahasuerus, who refused Jesus permission to sit down and rest when he passed his house on the way to Golgotha. Both legends agree in the sentence pronounced by Jesus on the offender, "Thou shalt wander on the earth till I return." A prey to remorse, he has since wandered from land to land without being able to find a grave. He is introduced in Edgar Quinet's Ahasuerus, by Chamisso, A. W. Schlegel, Lenau, H. C. Andersen, George Croly (in his novel Salathiel), Eugène Sue (in his novel Le Juif errant), and others. He is alleged to have appeared in different cities and countries through the centuries, the last such allegation being made in England in 1830.

Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dallas 199 (1796) (hīl'tēn). U.S. Supreme Court decision notable for its assertion of national authority in its view of state law as subordinate to the obligations of a national treaty. It was concerned with the binding effect of the treaty of peace with Great Britain after the American Revolutionary War, and especially of the provision which declared that "creditors on either side shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery . . . of all bona fide debts heretofore contracted." The court held that the treaty nullified the sequestering act of Virginia which was passed (1777) during the Revolution, and that, as the Constitution declared that all "treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land," the treaty was binding upon the states and must be recognized and applied by the judiciary. "A treaty," said Justice Samuel Chase, "cannot be the supreme law of the land, that is of all the United States, if any act of a State Legislature can stand in its way."

Warfel (wōr'fel), Harry Redcay. b. at Reading, Pa., March 21, 1899—. American educator. War of American Independence. See Revolutionary War.

War of 1812. War (1812-15) between the U.S. and Great Britain. The chief immediate causes of the war were two provocations offered by the British: the impressment of American seamen from American ships by British naval vessels; and the outright seizure of American ships. Impressment was practiced under the excuse that the men seized, being of British and Irish nativity, were British citizens; this flouted the American naturalization law and practice. Moreover, some native Americans were seized and compelled to serve in the British navy. As to ships, up to the outbreak of hostilities more than 900 of them had been seized. The French during the same years (of the Napoleonic wars) had seized about 550 American ships, but they made some nominal concessions to American claims, while the British acted in a manner typified by the incident in 1807 when the British warship Leopard in a surprise attack barely outside American territorial waters fired on the U.S. frigate Chesapeake and seized four seamen, two of whom were American born. The background of these incidents was the long struggle between Great Britain and Napoleonic France. With all their resources bent toward war, neither of these belligerent powers could spare enough shipping to maintain imports from the West Indies to Europe, and enterprising American shippers took over, but were harassed by Napoleon's Continental System, designed to inhibit trade with Britain, and by the British Orders in Council, intended to halt trade with France. The War of 1812, however, had other roots also. Along the western frontier of the U.S. as it then was, the British armed the Indians and operated in various ways to hamper American expansion. But the basic cause of the war, the pressure for westward expansion, was inexorable, and younger leaders coming to the fore (Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, William Lowndes Felix Grundy, Langdon Cheves, and others), popularly known as "War Hawks," frankly agitated for a martial solution of the situation. President Jefferson had tried to keep the peace by causing the enactment of a Nonimportation Act in 1806 and an Embargo Act in 1807. The British minister to Washington, David Erskine, concluded a satisfactory agreement, which was repudiated by the British foreign secretary, George Canning. The British Orders in Council were repealed before the outbreak of the war, but too late to stop the war. President Madison made demands on the British that impressment of American seamen should cease, that impressed men should be released, that spoiliations of American shipping should be indemnified, and that "paper blockades" should be abandoned as a device to justify seizure of American ships. In March, 1812, a British agent sold to the U.S. government papers showing that he had been commissioned by Sir James Craig, governor of Canada, to intrigue against national unity in the U.S. These events, more than the pressure of the "War Hawks," led to the American declaration of war on June 18, 1812. An attempted invasion of Canada by forces under General William Hull was repulsed; the British in turn forced the inglorious surrender of Hull at Detroit, on August 16. Thereafter the conflict on land was marked mostly by British successes, but at sea mostly by American victories. An American army operating along the Niagara River had no success, but on Aug. 13, 1812, the British warship Alert was captured by the American vessel Essex; on August 19 the British Guerrière was badly mauled by the American Constitution (affectionately nicknamed "Old Ironsides"); on October 18 the British Frolic surrendered to the American Wasp, and on October 25 the British Macedonian was taken by the United States. The year 1813 opened with an American defeat on land, at Frenchtown, offset by the victories of the American war vessel Hornet over the British Resolution on February 14 and the British Peacock on February 24. On June 1, however, the American frigate Chesapeake (the same that had been halted and searched in 1807) suffered from the British Shannon a disastrous defeat in which the Chesapeake's commander, Captain James Lawrence, was killed; his last order was "Don't give up the ship!" For a time the tide ran against the Americans on the high seas, various ships being captured and others forced to remain in the shelter of harbors, though the American Enterprise captured the British Boxer on September 5. Meanwhile in a cove near Erie, Pa., an American fleet was being busily improvised under the eye of Captain Oliver Hazard Perry, who on September 10 sailed out onto Lake Erie and captured the British squadron which had dominated those waters. This was the occasion of Perry's famous report (to General William Henry Harrison): "We have met the enemy and they are ours!" It was now possible for General Harrison, freed from the threat of a British fleet on his flanks, to advance on land. The British evacuated Detroit; Harrison followed them into Ontario, caught up with them at Chatham, and on October 5 soundly defeated them. In this battle Harrison commanded ab. 3,000 men, and was assisted by Perry's ships in the river; the British force comprised ab. 800 regulars and 1,200 Indians under Tecumseh, who fell in the fight. This victory, and further successes of American arms at Chippewa and at Lundy's Lane on July 5 and July 25, 1814, restored U.S. control of what was then the Northwest. But in August a strong British expedition sailed up Chesapeake Bay, scattered an American force at Bladensburg in Maryland, took the city of Washington, putting the torch to the Capitol, the White House, and other public buildings, and turned toward Baltimore. Before that city they were halted by the successful defense of Fort M'Henry, in the battle (September 12-13), which inspired Francis Scott Key to write The Star-Spangled Banner. Meanwhile in the north a grave threat developed as Sir George Prevost, governor of Canada, led an expedition southward along the western shore of Lake Champlain. However, a young American naval officer, Thomas Macdonough, after hastily building a few ships to add to the small squadron of which he had been put in command, on September 11 decisively defeated the British naval force which was keeping pace with Prevost's army. At the same time General Alexander Macomb gained a victory over Prevost on land. Meanwhile in August at Ghent in Flanders, negotiations looking toward peace had begun. The British at first demanded control of the Great Lakes and agreement to their plan to set up an Indian state, under their control, north of the Ohio River; but the news from Baltimore and from Lake Champlain caused them to modify their views. It took until Dec. 24, 1814, to arrive at agreement on terms which provided for a mutual restoration of territories taken by either party; a boundary commission; and a joint effort to suppress the slave trade. The British refused to discuss the rights of neutral merchantmen or the practice of impressment, and these issues, which mainly had caused the war, were not mentioned in the treaty. Even while negotiating the peace, the British government prepared its heaviest blow of the war, sending a large force of seasoned veterans to Louisiana. News of the treaty had not been received in the U.S. when this British army was defeated by a hastily assembled American army under Andrew Jackson at New Orleans, on Jan. 8, 1815. It took even longer for news of the treaty to be disseminated among American ships at sea, where warfare accordingly went on a little longer. On January 15 the American warship President surrendered to a British squadron; on February 20 the American Constitution overcame the British Levant and Cyane; and on March 23 the American Hornet captured the British Penguin. The war had been carried on by President Madison's administration under great difficulties; the army was small to begin with, it was poorly organized and in some instances very poorly led; government funds were low; and, most dangerous of all, the country was far from united in the national cause. Although New England, which had suffered from the Embargo Act of 1807, actually profited by the outbreak of hostilities, the War of 1812 was so unpopular in that section that there was much sentiment for secession from the Union and a separate peace with Great Britain. Fortunately the extreme Federalists who entertained these thoughts did not succeed in convoking an assembly to discuss them until Dec. 15, 1814, and the Hartford Convention did not quite dare to go to extremes. It adjourned on Jan. 5, 1815, after resolving merely that if secession were ever to be undertaken it should be done in time of peace. After the Hartford Convention the Federalist Party steadily lost political influence. The war was generally regarded as a second war for independence, and its outcome did much to improve national morale, to foster patriotism, and to strengthen sentiment for the Union.

War of Liberation. [German, Befreiungskrieg.] In German history, the war undertaken by Germany in 1813-14, with the aid of Russia, Great Britain, and other allies, to free Germany and other parts of Europe from the rule or influence of Napoleon and the French. After the French were defeated at Leipzig (October, 1813), the Allies drove them across the Rhine and eventually took Paris (March, 1814) and forced Napoleon's abdication (April, 1814). One of the chief results of the war was the freeing of various German states from French occupation and domination.

Warren, Sir Charles. b. at Bangor, Wales, Feb. 7, 1840; d. Jan. 21, 1927. British general and engineer, commander of a division in the Boer War (1899-1900). He was engaged as commissioner (Griqualand West) and in military operations in South Africa (1876-79), served in the Egyptian campaign in 1882, commanded the Bechuanaland expedition (1884-85), led the troops in the Suakin expedition (1886), and commanded the metropolitan police force at London (1886-88). He served under General R. H. Buller in the campaign for the relief of Ladysmith.

Warren, Charles. b. at Boston, March 9, 1868—American lawyer and historian, who won the 1923 Pulitzer prize in history for his work The Supreme Court in United States History (3 vols., 1922). He served as assistant U.S. attorney general (1914-18), as a member (1934-40) of the Harvard Board of Overseers, as private secretary to the governor of Massachusetts, and as a member of the committee of management of the Dictionary of American Biography. His books include also History of the American Bar, Colonial and Federal, To 1860 (1911), Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court (1923), The Making of the Constitution (1928), and Odd Byways in American History (1942).

Warren, Charles Beecher. b. at Bay City, Mich., April 10, 1870; d. Feb. 3, 1936. American lawyer and diplomat. He was ambassador to Japan (1921-23) and Mexico (1924).

Warren, Cyrus Moors. b. at Fox Hill, West Dedham, Mass., Jan. 15, 1824; d. at Manchester, Vt., Aug. 13, 1891. American chemist and manufacturer. He founded (1863) a chemical laboratory at Boston, where he conducted researches on the hydrocarbon elements in tars. He evolved the process of fractional condensation which became of vital importance in industry; applied to an investigation of hydrocarbons in Pennsylvania petroleum, it ushered in the phase of exact research in the field.

Warren, Earl. b. at Los Angeles, March 19, 1891—American politician. In 1920 he became deputy district attorney of Alameda County, Calif., and from 1925 to 1939 was district attorney, becoming widely known as a crusader against racketeers. He served as attorney general of California (1939-43) and became governor in 1943. During the 1946 election campaign, Warren won both Republican (his regular party) and Democratic nominations for the governorship in the primaries. At the 1948 Republican national convention he was chosen as candidate for the vice-presidency on the ticket with Thomas E. Dewey, but was defeated in the election. He was again elected governor of California in 1950, but resigned this office when he was chosen by President Eisenhower to become chief justice of the Supreme Court.

Warren, Francis Emroy. b. at Hinsdale, Mass., June 20, 1844; d. Nov. 24, 1929. American politician. Serving with the Union army in the Civil War, he received the Congressional Medal of Honor for valor in action near Port Hudson, La. He settled (1868) at Cheyenne, Wyo., served as governor (1885-86, 1889-90) of Wyoming Territory, was the first governor (1890) of the state of Wyoming, and was U.S. senator (1890-93, 1895-1929) from Wyoming.

Warren, George Frederick. b. at Harvard, Neb., Feb. 16, 1874; d. at Ithaca, N.Y., May 24, 1938. American agricultural economist. He was professor of farm management (1911-20) and of agricultural economics (1920 et seq.) at Cornell. As financial adviser to President F. D. Roosevelt, he advocated the so-called commodity dollar, a monetary unit whose gold content would vary with the variation in prices. This concept, an attempt to obtain a mild inflation during the economic depression, underlay in part the government's gold-buying policy from October, 1933. Author of Elements of Agriculture (1909), Laboratory Exercises in Farm Management (1910), and Farm Management (1913).

Warren, Gouverneur Kemble. b. at Cold Spring, N.Y., Jan. 8, 1830; d. at Newport, R.I., Aug. 8, 1882. American general and military engineer. He was graduated from West Point in 1850, served in surveys in the West, and was assistant professor of mathematics at West Point (1859-61). In September, 1861, he became captain of engineers. He served at Big Bethel, through the Peninsular and Manassas campaigns, and at Antietam, Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville. He was promoted brigadier general of volunteers in September, 1862, and major general of volunteers in May, 1863. In June of the latter year he was appointed chief engineer of the Army of the Potomac. He held Little Round Top with an improvised defense against J. B. Hood's men on the second day of the battle of Gettysburg, as commander of the 2nd army corps defended Bristow Station in October, 1863, and as commander of the 5th corps served through the Richmond campaign of 1864-65. He was removed from his command by General P. H. Sheridan after the battle of Five Forks, April 1, 1865 (Sheridan's charge of unreasonable delay was not upheld by a later court of inquiry). Later he commanded the Department of the Mississippi.

Warren, Henry White. b. at Williamsburg, Mass., Jan. 4, 1831; d. at Denver, Colo., July 22, 1912. American Methodist Episcopal clergyman; brother of William Fairfield Warren.

Warren, Howard Crosby. b. at Montclair, N.J., June 12, 1867; d. Jan. 4, 1934. American psychologist and teacher. He joined (1893) the staff of the psychology laboratory at Princeton, becoming (1902) professor of experimental psychology, was made director of the psychological laboratory in 1904, and served (1920-32) as the first chairman of the university's department of psychology. Author of Human Psychology (1919), Elements of Human Psychology (1922), and Dictionary of Psychology (1934).

Warren, James. b. at Plymouth, Mass., Sept. 28, 1726; d. Nov. 28, 1808. American political leader; husband of Mercy Warren. A member (1766-78) of the Massachusetts general court (legislature) and provincial congress, he was paymaster general (1775-76) of the Continental Army, served (1776-81) on the navy board for the Eastern Department, and was a major general (1776-77) of provincial militia.

Warren, John. b. at Roxbury, Mass., July 27, 1753; d. April 4, 1815. American physician. He is supposed to have taken an active role in the Boston "Tea Party" (1773). He became (1775) senior surgeon of the military hospital at Cambridge, was named (1776) surgeon of the general hospital on Long Island, and in 1777 settled at Boston, where he resumed private practice. In 1782 he drew up the scheme for the Harvard Medical School and upon its establishment in the same year became professor of anatomy and surgery. He was among the founders of the Massachusetts Humane Society, and served as its president.

Warren, Sir John Borlase. b. at Stapleford, Nottinghamshire, England, Sept. 2, 1753; d. at Greenwich, London, Feb. 22, 1822. English naval officer. He served (1777-82, 1793-1814) in the navy, as captain (1781), commodore (1794), rear admiral (1799), and admiral (1810). He is noted especially for having driven off the French expedition attempting to land with Wolfe Tone in Ireland (1798).

Warren, John Byrne Leicester. [Title: 3rd Baron de Tabley; pseudonyms, George F. Preston, William Lancaster.] b. in Cheshire, England, April 26, 1835; d. at Ryde, Isle of Wight, Nov. 22, 1895. Warren, John Collins. b. at Roxbury, Mass., Aug. 1, 1778; d. May 4, 1856. American surgeon and teacher; son of John Warren (1753-1815). He served as adjunct professor (1809-15) and full professor (1815-47) of anatomy at the Harvard Medical School, of which he was also dean (1816-19). Named (1821) the first surgeon of the Massachusetts General Hospital, he is noted for his association with the first public exhibition (Oct. 16, 1846) of ether anesthesia (he operated; the anesthesia was administered by W. T. G. Morton).

Warren, John Collins. b. at Boston, May 4, 1842; d. Nov. 3, 1927. American surgeon and teacher; grandson of John Collins Warren (1778-1856). He became a member of the faculty of the Harvard Medical School, where he served (1899-1907) as Moseley professor of surgery. Author of The Anatomy and Development of Rodent Ulcer (1872), The Healing of Arteries after Ligation in Man and Animals (1886), Surgical Pathology and Therapeutics (1895), and, with W. W. Keen, American Text Book of Surgery (1892).

Warren, Joseph. b. at Roxbury, Mass., June 11, 1741; killed at the battle of Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775. American physician and soldier. He graduated at Harvard in 1759, practiced medicine in Boston, and became one of the patriot leaders in Massachusetts previous to the Revolution. He delivered orations on the anniversary of the Boston massacre in 1772 and 1775, was chairman of the committee of public safety in 1774 and president of the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts, and was the man who sent Paul Revere and William Dawes toward Lexington and Concord to warn the patriot leaders that the British were marching. He was made major general of the Massachusetts forces in June, 1775, and served as a volunteer aide at Bunker Hill.

Warren, Josiah. b. at Boston, c1798; d. at Charlestown, Mass., April 14, 1874. American social reformer and inventor. Converted to the doctrines of Robert Owen, he settled (1825) at the Owenite colony of New Harmony, Ind. He formulated his theory of extreme individualism and by his subsequent activities became the founder of philosophical anarchism in America. He operated (1827-29) at Cincinnati an "equity store" for testing his theory that the social exchange of goods and services should hinge on cost alone, founded (1833) The Peaceful Revolutionist, settled (1850) at New York, and soon thereafter established the town of Modern Times on Long Island, N.Y., which until its demise (c1862) attracted many eccentrics. Among his inventions were a lard-burning lamp (1821), a speed press (c1830), a cylinder press (1837-40) which was self-inking and printed from a continuous roll of paper (first employed in printing the South-Western Sentinel at Evansville, Ind.), and a process (1846) for the rapid and cheap production of stereotype plates. Author of Equitable Commerce (1846) and True Civilization an Immediate Necessity (1863).

Warren, Mercy. [Maiden name, Otis.] b. at Barnstable, Mass., Sept. 14, 1728; d. Oct. 19, 1814. American author; sister of James Otis. She was married (1754) to James Warren, and as a poet and historian lauded the Revolutionary cause in such works as Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous (1790) and History of the Rise, Progress, and Termination of the American Revolution (3 vols., 1805). She was also the author of political satires, including The Adulter (1773) and The Group (1775). During her lifetime she was a political and intellectual associate of Thomas Jefferson, Samuel and John Adams, Elbridge Gerry, John Dickinson, and others; Abigail Adams was her friend, but her comments on Federalism, which she opposed, in her history of the Revolution caused John Adams to break with her.

Warren, Sir Peter. b. 1703; d. in Ireland, July 29, 1752. British naval officer who aided in the capture (1745) of Louisbourg, and took part in the defeat (1747) of the French squadron off Cape Finisterre.

Warren, Robert Penn. b. at Guthrie, Ky., April 24, 1905—. American novelist, poet, and teacher. The junior member (1923-25) of the sectionalist group that put out the Fugitive, he attended Vanderbilt and was a Rhodes scholar (1928-30) at Oxford. He was associate professor (1934-42) at Louisiana State University, professor (1942 et seq.) at the University of Minnesota, consultant in poetry (1944-45) at the Library of Congress, and professor of playwrighting at Yale (1951 et seq.). He was an editor (1935-42) of the Southern Review. His poetry includes Thirty-Six Poems (1936), Eleven Poems on the Same Theme (1942), and Selected Poems (1944); his novels include Night Rider (1939), At Heaven's Gate (1943), All the King's Men (1946; winner of the 1947 Pulitzer prize for fiction), and World Enough and Time (1950). He is author of the biography John Brown: The Making of a Martyr (1929) and the story collection The Circus in the Attic (1947), and editor with Cleanth Brooks of Understanding Poetry (1938) and Understanding Fiction (1943).

Warren, Samuel. b. 1781; d. at Ardwick, Manchester, England, May 23, 1852. English Methodist preacher; father of Samuel Warren (1807-77). He withdrew with 15,000 of his own followers from the Wes'yan organization, and organized (c1835) the United Methodist Free Churches.

Warren, Samuel. b. in Denbighshire, Wales, May 23, 1807; d. at London, July 29, 1877. British novelist and legal writer; son of Samuel Warren (1781-1852). His chief work was the once extremely popular novel Ten Thousand a Year (published in Blackwood's Magazine, 1839-41).

Warren, Samuel Prowse. b. at Montreal, Canada, Feb. 18, 1841; d. 1914. American organist and composer. His compositions include church music, part songs, and piano music.

Warren, Whitney. b. 1864; d. Jan. 24, 1943. American architect. He studied under Daumet and Girault at the École des Beaux-Arts at Paris; later he received an honorary M.A. from Harvard. He was a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters and of several French associations of architects.

Warren, William. b. at Bath, England, May 10, 1767; d. at Baltimore, Md., Oct. 19, 1832. American actor and manager. He spent the greater part of his American stage career at Baltimore and Philadelphia. He was particularly noted for playing the roles of old men.

Warren, William. b. at Philadelphia, Nov. 17, 1812; d. at Boston, Sept. 21, 1888. American comedian; son of William Warren (1767-1832). He made his first appearance in 1832 at Philadelphia. In 1845 he played at London; he was connected (1846-82) with the Howard Athenaeum and Boston Museum at Boston.

Warren, William Fairfield. b. at Williamsburg, Mass., March 13, 1833; d. at Brookline, Mass., Dec. 6, 1929. American Methodist Episcopal clergyman and educator; brother of Henry White Warren. He served (1867-73) as president of the Boston Theological School, which became the first department of Boston University, of which he was acting president (1869-73) and president (1873-1903). He served as professor (1867-1920) at the theological school and was its dean (1871-73, 1903-11). As an administrator he was interested in securing educational opportunities for women and was influential in making Boston University the first American university to grant (1878) a Ph.D. to a woman.

Warsaw. Village in W New York, county seat of Wyoming County; manufactures of buttons, elevators, paper boxes, and knit goods. 3,713 (1950).

Warsaw. Grand duchy created by Napoleon at the treaty of Tilsit in 1807, and given to Frederick Augustus I, who had just taken the title of king of Saxony. It was formed from the Polish possessions acquired by Prussia in 1793 and 1795, and was dissolved in 1813.

Warsaw. [Polish, Warszawa; German, Warschau (vâr'shou); French, Varsovie.] City in C Poland, comprising the województwo (province) of Warszawa, capital of Poland, situated on both banks of the Vistula River, S of the influx of the Narew River, ab. 325 mi. E of Berlin. Already damaged in earlier stages of World War II, the city was almost completely razed by the Germans after the unsuccessful uprising in August, 1944. However, the reconstituted Polish government decided to retain Warsaw as the capital of Poland after the war and to rebuild it. Within five years most of the rubble had been removed, and streets were laid and paved. New housing settlements and new public buildings were erected. Several historical palaces have been restored, and many others are under reconstruction. Churches are also being reconstructed. But perhaps the greatest achievement was the construction of a large east-west highway which, going through Warsaw, connects the left and right banks of the Vistula River. The highway speeds the traffic from the E and W sections of Poland by eliminating old detour routes around metropolitan Warsaw. It includes the Silesia-Dąbrowa bridge across the Vistula River (1,500 ft. long), a 650-ft. tunnel, and two viaducts. More than 1,000 trees and 20,000 shrubs were planted along the highway. Construction of the highway included restoration of historic 17th and 18th century buildings which bordered its line. Warsaw has a tractor factory (actually at Ursus, a Warsaw suburb), and chemical (lubricants, soap), electrical, food, garment, and leather industries. Institutions of higher learning include the university, and an institute of technology.

Warsaw became the residence of the kings of Poland in the 16th century. It was conquered by the Swedes in 1655, 1656, and 1702; occupied by the Russians 1764-74 and after 1793; Russian soldiers were killed in an uprising in 1794, and the city was besieged by Prussian and Russian armies; it capitulated on Nov. 5, 1794. Warsaw was incorporated (1795-1806) into Prussia, was made capital of the duchy of Warsaw in 1807, was occupied by the Austrians in 1809, and by the Russians in 1813; subsequently it was the capital of Russian Poland. Warsaw was in the hands of Polish insurgents from Nov. 29, 1830, until Sept. 8, 1831, when it capitulated to the Russians. In World War I, the city was occupied by the Germans in August, 1915, and became the seat of a German governor general; Joseph Pilsudski, in the name of the new Republic of Poland, took over on Nov. 11, 1918. In World War II, the city was subjected to bombardment and siege; the Germans marched into Warsaw on Sept. 27, 1939. The large Jewish population of about 400,000 people, swelled by refugees from smaller towns, was herded into a closely guarded ghetto in October, 1940; many Jews from other Polish towns were brought here (1941-42); at the same time shipments to the death camp at Treblinka and other concentration camps proceeded. When the population was reduced to ab. 40,000, an uprising of the ghetto took place; resistance lasted from April 19, 1943, to May 16, 1943; in the course of the fighting extermination was completed except for a relatively small number of Jews who had escaped by going underground. The uprising of the Polish underground army occurred on Aug. 1, 1944, when it was assumed that the Russian army would enter the city; the uprising was suppressed and the city almost entirely destroyed by the Germans; the Russians fought their way into the ruins in bitter fighting between September, 1944, and January, 1945; they occupied the city on Jan. 17, 1945. Pop. 1,300,000 (est. 1939), 478,755 (1946), 600,767 (est. 1950).

Warsaw, Battle of. Victory gained by the Swedes and Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg, over the Poles, July 28-30, 1656.

Warsaw, Battle of. Military engagement (August, 1920), marking the furthest point reached by the Russian counteroffensive in the Russo-Polish War. With Polish troops under Marshal Józef Piłsudski, who was assisted by General Maxime Weygand, the Russians were forced back in heavy fighting.

War Settlements Act. [Also, Settlement of War Claims Act.] Act of the U.S. Congress passed in 1928 providing for the settlement of World War I claims made against the U.S. by German, Austrian, and Hungarian claimants and by U.S. nationals against the former Central Powers. It created a fund for payments and authorized the presidential appointment of an American arbiter.

Warton (wör'ton), Joseph. b. at Dunsfold, Surrey, England, in April, 1722; d. at Wickham, Hampshire, England, Feb. 23, 1800. English poet, critic, clergyman, and schoolmaster; son of Thomas Warton (c1688-1745), and brother of Thomas Warton (1728-90). He held (1745 et seq.) various church posts, and was second master (1755-63) and headmaster (1766-93) of Winchester. Author of The Enthusiast, or the Lover of Nature (1744), Odes on Various Subjects (1746), and Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope (2 vols., 1756, 1782). In his poetry and essays, he was an opponent of the canons of "correctness" observed by Alexander Pope, and is therefore considered one of the principal critical forerunners of the Romantic Movement in England. Among his best poems are The Dying Indian, The Enthusiast, and Ode to Fancy.

Warton, Thomas. b. c1688; d. at Basingstoke, Hampshire, England, Sept. 10, 1745. English poet and schoolmaster; father of Joseph Warton and Thomas Warton (1728-90). He was professor of poetry (1718-28) at Oxford, and vicar of Basingstoke and master of the Basingstoke Grammar School from 1723 to 1745. Author of Poems on Several Occasions (1748); among them are "Ode to Sleep" and "Retirement, An Ode."

Warton, Thomas. b. at Basingstoke, England, Jan. 9, 1728; d. May 21, 1790. English critic and poet laureate, professor of poetry (1757-67) and of history (1785-90) at Oxford; son of Thomas Warton (1688-1745), and brother of Joseph Warton. He became poet laureate in 1785. His chief works are a History of English Poetry (3 vols., 1774-81), Pleasures of Melancholy (1747), Observations on the Poetry of Spenser (1754), and editions of Theocritus, the Greek Anthology, and the minor poems of Milton. He was a leader of the critics of Thomas Chatterton's poems as forgeries. Warton's poetry reflects his interest in Gothic ruins and he is generally considered an early precursor of the romantic Gothic revival.

Warwick (wor'ik), Earl of. [Title of Richard Neville; also: Earl of Salisbury; called "the Kingmaker."] b. Nov. 22, 1428; killed at the battle of Barnet, April 14, 1471. English politician and military commander. He was related to both the Yorkist and the Lancastrian families. He inherited the title of Earl of Salisbury, and became Earl of Warwick through his marriage with the daughter of Richard de Beauchamp (Earl of Warwick). At first he sided with the Yorkists, and served at the first battle of St. Albans in 1455. He was made governor of Calais, again joined the Yorkists in 1459, defeated the Lancastrians at Northampton in July, 1460, and took Henry VI prisoner. He was defeated at St. Albans in 1461 by Margaret of Anjou, Henry's wife, joined with Edward IV and reentered London in 1461, and won with Edward the victory of Tewton in 1461. He was made warden of the Scottish marches, constable of Dover, lord high chamberlain, and other such high posts, being practically ruler of England in this period; he repressed the Lancastrian rising in 1463-64. He opposed the marriage of Edward IV with Elizabeth Woodville, and the alliance with Burgundy, and was driven into revolt by the king, whom he took prisoner in 1469, but soon released. He conspired with his son-in-law George, Duke of Clarence, the king's brother, against Edward IV in 1470, fled to France, and adopted the cause of the Lancastrians. He landed in England, drove Edward IV to Flanders, and restored Henry VI in 1470. Warwick was finally overthrown by Edward IV at Barnet in 1471.

Warwick, Countess of. [Original name, Frances Evelyn Maynard.] b. at London, Dec. 10, 1861; d. at Dunmow, Essex, England, July 26, 1938. English philanthropist. She married (1881) Francis Greville, Lord Brooke, later 5th Earl of Warwick. She was famous as a hostess during the reign of King Edward VII. She founded a college in Warwickshire for training girls in horticulture, dairy farming, bee and poultry keeping, and other subjects, a science and technical school for children, and a home for crippled children. A member of the Labour Party, she was prominent as a socialist. Her books include Autobiography of Joseph Arch, A Woman and the War, and Nature Quest.

Warwick. Municipal borough in C England, county seat of Warwickshire, situated on the river Avon ab. 2 mi. SW of Leamington Spa, ab. 89 mi. NW of London by rail. Warwick contains a famous castle, with machiolated towers and battlemented walls, the effect of which is much enhanced by their framing of splendid trees. The great Caesar's Tower dates back almost to the Norman conquest. The spacious residential buildings are of the 15th century and later, extensively restored; they contain many historical relics, paintings, and other works of art. Saint Mary's is a large church in Perpendicular style, in great part rebuilt in 1694. The church is chiefly notable for the superb Beauchamp Chapel, dating from 1464. It contains the beautifully sculptured tombs of the earls of Warwick and of Robert Dudley, 1st Earl of Leicester. Warwick was a British settlement, and became a Roman fortress c50 A.D. It was rebuilt by Ethelfleda c915. The town has manufactures of stoves and grates. 15,350 (1951).

He was military aide (1917) to the chiefs of railway and diplomatic missions to Russia, served (1918) with the 26th division at Toul and Château-

- Thierry, and was a staff member (1921) of the secretariat of the U.S. delegation to the disarmament conference at Washington. Author of The Cable Game (1911), Trails, Trappers and Tenderfeet (1912), Victory in Defeat (1916), The Russian Offensive (1917), How One Newspaper Served Its Public (1927), and other books.
- Washburn, William Drew. b. at Livermore, Me., Jan. 14, 1831; d. July 29, 1912. American legislator and industrialist; brother of Israel Washburn. He developed interests in real estate, water power, lumbering, and the manufacture of flour, serving as a director of the Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Company. He served (1879-85) in the House of Representatives and was a U.S. senator (1889-95) from Minnesota.
- Washburne (wosh'bērn), Elihu Benjamin. b. at Livermore, Me., Sept. 23, 1816; d. at Chicago, Oct. 23, 1887. American statesman and diplomat; brother of Israel Washburn. He was a Whig and later a Republican member of Congress from Illinois (1853-69), and was chairman of the committee on commerce. He was secretary of state (March 5-17, 1859), at the beginning of Grant's administration, and U.S. minister to France (1869-77). He was the only foreign representative who remained in Paris through both the siege and the Commune period. He wrote Recollections of a Minister to France (1887).
- Washburn Range. Group of mountains in the Yellowstone National Park, forming a U-shaped ridge above Yellowstone River. Highest point, 10,317 ft.
- Washington (wosh'ŋton). [Called the "Evergreen State"; also, the "Chinook State."] State of the NW United States, bounded by the Canadian province of British Columbia on the N, Idaho on the E, Oregon (partly separated by the Columbia River) on the S, and the Pacific Ocean, Juan de Fuca Strait, and the Strait of Georgia on the W.
- Population, Area, and Political Divisions. Washington is divided for administrative purposes into 39 counties. The state sends six representatives to Congress, and has eight electoral votes. Leading cities include Bellingham, Everett, Seattle, Spokane, Tacoma, and Yakima. Capital, Olympia; area, 66,977 sq. mi. (68,192 sq. mi., including water); pop. 2,378,963 (1950), an increase of 37 percent over the 1940 figure. The state ranks 19th in area, and 23rd (on the basis of the 1950 census) in population.
- Terrain and Climate. The Cascade Mountains traverse the state from N to S, dividing it into two distinctly different sections. The E two-thirds is a plateau of arid land and intermittent fertile spots. The W is a fertile region. In the NW are the Olympic Mountains which border Juan de Fuca Strait, Puget Sound, and the Pacific and are the site of Olympic National Park (1,323 sq. mi.; established 1938). Mount Rainier (14,498 ft.) in the Cascades is the highest point in the state; an inactive volcano and possessing a large glacial system, it is located in Mount Rainier National Park (ab. 377 sq. mi.; established 1899). Washington is almost wholly in the basin of the Columbia, which flows S from the NE corner of the state and then W, forming much of the boundary between Washington and Oregon. The remainder of the W border is formed by the Snake, which joins the Columbia in the SE. Another tributary of the Columbia is the Yakima in the S and C area. On the Columbia is the Grand Coulee Dam, a part of the great Columbia River reclamation project; the third highest dam in the U.S., it is used for flood and river control, irrigation, and power. The Bonneville Dam on the Columbia lies on the Oregon-Washington border, ab. 40 mi. N of Portland, Ore. Among the sizable lakes in the state is Lake Chelan, which has an outlet to the Columbia. The climate in the E is dry because the Cascades condense much of the Pacific moisture, but the W has a heavy rainfall.
- Industry, Agriculture, and Trade. Agriculture is the leading occupation of the state, Washington now outranking all other states in the production of apples. Wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, corn, peas, hops, and other fruits besides apples are also important. Despite its aridity the E part provides excellent grazing, and sheep and cattle are grown extensively. Wool is a major product of the state. Washington's fisheries take high rank, particularly for their salmon catch; halibut, oysters, crab, and tuna are among the other fish caught. The state has fāt, fāte, fār, āsk, fāre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pine; not, nōte, mōve, nōr; up, lūte, pūll; ʔH, then; ǵ, d o r j; ǵ, s o r sh; t, t o r ch;

valuable forests, and lumbering is an occupation of great scope. The state is rich in minerals, and there is considerable quarrying of granite, limestone, sandstone, and marble. Coal, gold, silver, clay, antimony, copper, lead, zinc, tungsten, mercury, arsenic, and platinum are also found. Canning and other food processing, shipbuilding, and airplane production are the main industries. World War II produced great expansion of these industries, particularly at Seattle, which is also an aluminum-refining center. Seattle is the state's major port, exporting great quantities of merchandise to Europe and Asia. Bellingham, Spokane, and Tacoma are also important manufacturing cities. Annual income in the state from agriculture ranges as high as 571 million dollars; from mineral output, as high as 34 million; from manufacturing, as high as 875 million.

History. Juan de Fuca Strait was discovered in 1592, and explored in 1789. The mouth of the Columbia was explored (1792) by the American captain Robert Gray, and further explorations were conducted (1805) by Lewis and Clark. The first permanent settlement of Americans was made (1845) at the site of what is now Tumwater. The boundary of the Oregon country, in which Washington was included, was settled with Great Britain in 1846. Washington formed part of the territory of Oregon organized in 1848; organized as a territory itself in 1853; admitted to the Union (as the 42nd state) on Nov. 11, 1889. The discovery of gold in the W. and the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad brought a rapid increase in population. Seattle was the site of the Alaska-Yukon Exposition, held (1909) to portray the vast resources of the West.

Culture. Washington's urban population in 1950 was ab. 63 percent of the total population. More than ten percent of the white population is foreign born (mainly Canadians, Scandinavians, Germans, and English). There are also several thousands of Japanese and Indians living in the state. The city was a center for the gold rush to the Yukon. Its fine location has made it a tourist center. Spokane is the center of a large mountain and lake recreation area. The state's institutions of higher learning include the state-supported University of Washington, at Seattle, and the State College of Washington, at Pullman; Gonzaga University, at Spokane. The state motto is Al-ki, meaning "Bye and Bye." The state flower is the rhododendron.

Washington. Capital city of the United States, now co-extensive with the District of Columbia, situated on the E bank of the Potomac River at that river's junction with the Anacostia River. Alexandria, originally a part of the city, was retroceded (1846) to Virginia. Georgetown, separated from the city proper by Rock Creek, was annexed to Washington in 1878. Washington's area is 61 sq. mi. (69 sq. mi., including water); pop. 663,091 (1940), 802,178 (1950), although the population at the height of World War II is estimated to have risen to 1,250,000. One of the world's great and beautiful cities, Washington is famous for its magnificent public buildings, of which the best known is probably the White House, the official residence of the President of the United States, located at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. A handsome mansion in the English Renaissance style, it is the oldest government building in the city. Its cornerstone was laid (1792) by George Washington, and the house was first occupied by John Adams. It has undergone numerous improvements, the most recent instance being a 5,400,000-dollar reconstruction project carried on during the Truman administration. President Truman and his family resided during this period at Blair House, formerly a guest house for foreign dignitaries. Also well known is the Capitol, situated on Capitol Hill, 83 ft. above the Potomac. Its cornerstone was laid Sept. 18, 1793. Nearby and connected with the Capitol by underground railway are the House and Senate office buildings. The Washington Monument, erected in honor of George Washington, is an obelisk of white marble, capped with aluminum, and 555 ft., 5½ in. high and 55 ft., 1½ ft. sq. at the base. Its cornerstone was laid on July 4, 1848, and work progressed with funds gained by popular subscription until 1854; completed (1884) at government expense. The Pentagon, largest office building in the world, completed in 1943 to house the War Department, is actually on the Virginia side of the Potomac. Other famous buildings of Washington include those of the Department of Commerce, Labor Department, Post Office Department, Bureau of Internal Revenue, National Archives, and Federal Trade Commission, all in the triangle between the White House and the Capitol; also, the Supreme Court building, Library of Congress, Folger Shakespeare Library, Lincoln Memorial, Jefferson Memorial, Federal Reserve Board, Department of Agriculture, Department of the Interior, Government Printing Office, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, State Department Building, Treasury Building, the Smithsonian Institution (including the National Museum, National Gallery of Art, Phillips Memorial Gallery, and the Freer Gallery of Art), the Corcoran Gallery, and Ford's Theater (place where Lincoln was assassinated). Famous institutions of the city are Saint Elizabeth's Hospital and Walter Reed Hospital. Notable privately owned structures are Constitution Hall, Union Station, Pan American Union building, the Cathedral of Saint Peter and Saint Paul (known also as Washington Cathedral), which is still under construction; National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, also still under construction; the Franciscan Monastery, and numerous famous hotels. Opposite the city on the S bank of the Potomac is Arlington National Cemetery, containing the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Bolling Field and Washington National Airport serve the city. The conduct of government business is the main industry of the city. A large retail trade supplies its needs. There is also a prosperous tourist industry catering to the more than three million who visit the capital each year. The favorite visiting time for tourists is the Easter season, when the famous cherry trees are usually in bloom. The city generally has rather mild winters but hot and humid summers.

History and Culture. The site for the capital city was chosen (1790) by George Washington, who was then president. The city was planned by Major Pierre Charles l'Enfant, a French engineer. When the government was moved (1800) there from Philadelphia during the administration of John Adams the city was in great part no more than swamps, mud flats, and woods. Abigail Adams, the president's wife, is quoted as saying that she used an unfinished room in the White House, now known as the East Room, as a place in which to dry laundry. Washington was incorporated as a city in 1802; occupied (1814) and burned by the British. The city was Union military headquarters in the Civil War, and was threatened (1864) by the Confederates under Early. Its municipal government was abolished in 1871 when it lost its charter, and a territorial government was established that same year. The city became (1878) co-extensive with the District of Columbia when it annexed Georgetown. The present commission form of government was instituted in 1874. During both World Wars the city was a busy military center, and in World War II it was virtually the capital of the world. Painting of the president's residence white in 1817 in order to hide charred spots left by British fires gave rise to the popular name White House, which became the official name in 1902. During the period leading to the Civil War Washington was an important stop on the Underground Railroad. Among the many educational institutions in the city are the American University, Catholic University of America (outstanding Catholic university in the U.S.), Gallaudet College (for the deaf), Georgetown University (known for its foreign service school), George Washington University, Howard University (largest Negro university in the U.S.), the National Catholic School of Social Service (affiliated with the Catholic University of America), National University, Trinity College, and Washington College of Law. Foundations, academies, and private societies of special interest include the National Academy of Sciences, the Brookings Institution, the Carnegie Institution of Washington, and the National Geographic Society.

Washington, Booker Taliaferro. b. near Hale's Ford, Va., April 5, 1856; d. at Tuskegee, Ala., Nov. 14, 1915. American Negro educator, author, and lecturer. He was born a slave, worked his way as a janitor through Hampton Institute (1872-75), and, after teaching and studying for several years, founded (1881) the Tuskegee Institute for the practical training of Negroes, the growth and success of which was largely due to his efforts. He was the author of The Future of the American Negro (1899), Sowing and Reaping (1900), Up from Slavery, an autobiography (1900), Character Building (1902), The Story of my Life and Work (1903), Working with the Hands; Experiences with Industrial Training at Tuskegee (1904), Tuskegee and Its People (1905), a Life of Frederick Douglass (1906), The Negro in Business (1907), The Story of the Negro (1909), Chapters from my Experience (1911), The Man Farthest Down, a Record of Observations and Study in Europe (1912), and others.

Washington, Bushrod. b. in Westmoreland County, Va., June 5, 1762; d. at Philadelphia, Nov. 26, 1829. American jurist; nephew of George Washington. A graduate (1778) of William and Mary, he was one of the first members of Phi Beta Kappa, which was organized there in 1776. He was a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, and of the Virginia ratifying convention of 1788, and was an associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court (1798-1829). After the death of Martha Washington in 1802, he inherited the house and part of the estate at Mount Vernon and the library and papers of George Washington.

Washington, George. b. in Westmoreland County, Va., Feb. 22, 1732; d. at "Mount Vernon," near Alexandria, Va., Dec. 14, 1799. American Revolutionary patriot, soldier, and statesman, commander of the Continental Army (1775-83), president of the Federal Convention (1787), first President of the United States under the Constitution (1789-97). He received the major portion of his schooling under his father and his elder half brother, Lawrence Washington, and through his association with Lord Fairfax (Thomas, 6th Baron Fairfax) was sent (1748) on a survey of the latter's Shenandoah lands. In 1749 Washington became surveyor of Culpeper County, Va.; following a journey to Barbados to care for the dying Lawrence, he returned to Virginia, where he became (c1752) the proprietor of Mount Vernon, an estate near Alexandria, Va., bequeathed to him by Lawrence. He was appointed (1752) district adjutant by Governor Robert Dinwiddie and in 1753 led a small expeditionary party into the Ohio country, bearing the governor's ultimatum to the French who were infiltrating a region claimed by the English. His report of the strenuous and hazardous journey, published as The Journal of Major George Washington . . . (1754), made him known in America and England. Commissioned a lieutenant colonel, Washington started out (April 2, 1754) at the head of 150 men to reinforce the forks of the Ohio (on the site of present-day Pittsburgh) against the efforts of the French. Learning that the French had captured the fort (named by them Fort Duquesne) and were advancing, he erected Fort Necessity at Great Meadows, Pa. With the help of the Indians, he defeated (May 27, 1754) the French but was driven back to Fort Necessity, where he came to terms with the French after a ten-hour assault by them. Washington resigned from the Virginia military forces toward the close of 1754; in 1755 he became an aide on Edward Braddock's staff and, although in poor health at the time, took part in the ill-fated battle at the Monongahela in which Braddock was killed and the British forces routed. Appointed (1755) colonel and commander in chief of the Virginia forces, he took charge of the colony's frontier defense during the first half of the French and Indian Wars. He resigned his post in 1758 after the French abandoned Fort Duquesne. He married (Jan. 6, 1759) Martha Custis, the widow of Daniel Parke Custis, and retired to his plantation at Mount Vernon. Elected (1758) a Burgess from Frederick, and later from his home county, Fairfax, he served continuously until 1775. He also served (1760-74) as a justice of Fairfax, sitting at Alexandria. The years 1759 to 1774 were spent chiefly as a gentleman farmer, sportsman, and legislator. In 1770 he made a voyage down the Ohio and up the Kanawha to locate the bounty land granted to the soldiers of his Virginia regiment, for whom he acted as attorney and agent. In the controversies between the colonies and Great Britain, Washington was early a supporter of the American cause. He was among the burgesses who assembled (May 27, 1774) at the Raleigh Tavern following the governor's dissolution of the assembly and served (July 18, 1774) as chairman of the Alexandria meeting at which the Fairfax Resolutions were adopted. In the same year he was selected as a Virginia delegate to the First Continental Congress and later was assigned to the command of the independent militia companies of several Virginia counties. As a delegate to the Second Continental Congress (1775) at Philadelphia, he served on the committee which planned the defense of New York and drew up the army regulations. He was elected (June 15, 1775) to command the American forces, taking command at Cambridge, Mass., on July 3, 1775, of the armies formed by the New England colonies to oppose the British troops concentrated at Boston. In the critical years that lay ahead, Washington's military operations were destined to be performed under grave handicaps. Congress, having no legal power to command money, troops, or supplies from the constituent states, was unable to afford him sufficient support for his troops, most of whom, because of the initial enlistment policy, declined to serve for more than short terms; the problem of military discipline was also for some time serious. Thanks to the arrival of heavy artillery, captured at Ticonderoga on Lake Champlain and sledged to the outskirts of Boston during the winter of 1775-76, Washington was enabled to fortify Dorchester Heights, commanding the city, and compel the British to evacuate it in March, 1776. Believing the British would move against New York City, Washington hastened there with most of the troops enlisted in the Continental service. The British, in fact, withdrew to Halifax, Nova Scotia, but in July-August, 1776, descended on New York, landing first on Staten Island and then crossing to Long Island. Washington, faced by a superior British naval and military force and after sustaining defeats in the fighting around Long Island and New York, retreated through New Jersey and, crossing the Delaware, entered Pennsylvania. The American course, which had looked so promising after the enforced British evacuation of Boston, was now at low ebb, largely because of Washington's failure to order General Nathaniel Greene to evacuate Fort Mifflin near the northern tip of Manhattan island, an error which resulted in the British capture of a large proportion of Washington's best troops and irreplaceable military supplies. This disaster was offset, however, when on Christmas night, 1776, Washington, recrossing the Delaware, overtook the Hessian mercenaries at Trenton in a surprise action which netted him some 1,000 prisoners and much matériel. A short time later he moved eastward through New Jersey and forced the British to abandon their New Jersey line and retreat to Brunswick. In 1777 Congress passed military measures which to some degree strengthened Washington's hand, but he was still compelled to rely for manpower upon the state militia forces. Using largely inexperienced troops, he led an action against the British at Brandywine Creek, in Pennsylvania (Sept. 11, 1777), from which he was compelled to retreat. On September 26 the British entered

Philadelphia, then the largest and most important city in the U.S. and seat of the Continental Congress, whose members had been forced to leave after the American defeat at Brandywine had opened the way for the British advance. Three weeks later Washington tried to repeat his success at Trenton by a surprise attack on a large British detachment at Germantown, near Philadelphia, but after a brief initial success the American troops became confused, fired upon each other, and were driven off, sustaining considerable losses. There followed a period of worry and hardship in winter cantonment at Valley Forge, Pa. The Conway Cabal, a supposed conspiracy in and out of Congress to remove Washington from his command, was believed by him to exist and added to his anxiety. The spring of 1778, however, brought fresh hope. John Burgoyne's surrender of his British army to General Horatio Gates at Saratoga, on the upper Hudson, in October, 1777, induced France, which had long been giving the Americans secret aid, to enter into a formal alliance and send a fleet and army to America. Apprehensive of being cut off by the French, General William Howe decided to evacuate Philadelphia and concentrate his forces at New York. The alliance with France, announced in 1778, the British evacuation of Philadelphia, and the rigorous training of the later months at Valley Forge combined to lift the spirits of Washington and his army. Marching through New Jersey, with New York as his objective, Washington fought the battle of Monmouth (June 28, 1778), where he succeeded in reorganizing the American forces in the midst of a retreat, said (but probably without justification) to have been due to the cowardice or treachery of General Charles Lee in command of the advance force. The Continental Army passed the summer of 1778 and winter of 1778-79 near the Hudson in New York and New Jersey. Though having insufficient troops and supplies for an attack on the British in New York, Washington was able to dispatch an expedition to the Pennsylvania-New York frontier which succeeded in eliminating the Indian menace in this harassed region. An attempt to dislodge the British from Newport, R.I., which they had occupied since December, 1776, was, however, unsuccessful. From 1779 to 1781 the South was the scene of most of the fighting, with General Greene of Rhode Island and Lord Cornwallis in the leading roles. The war was effectually terminated by the combined operations of the American army and a French fleet and army at Yorktown, Va. The siege of the latter town brought hostilities to a close on Oct. 19, 1781, when Cornwallis surrendered to Washington. During the time between the triumph at Yorktown and the signing of the Treaty of Paris (1783) Washington made his headquarters near West Point, N.Y., on the Hudson. It was during this period that he unequivocally repudiated (May 22, 1782) at Newburgh, N.Y., the proposal of Colonel Lewis Nicola to employ the army to make Washington a king. Aware that the dissatisfactions of the veterans might have serious consequences, Washington made pleas for the just treatment of the officers and men of the Continental Army. In the spring of 1783 he led the remaining Continental troops into New York City on the heels of the British evacuation and took leave of his officers at Fraunces Tavern. Going to Annapolis, he submitted to Congress his resignation from the army and retired to Mount Vernon. Depreciated Continental currency and Washington's investments in government certificates contributed to his financial difficulties after he returned to Virginia. The operations of his plantations were apparently not highly profitable, and toward the end of his life Washington was sometimes pinched for ready cash. In 1784, he went on a westward journey of more than 650 miles, searching for a route between the Potomac and Ohio rivers in behalf of the Potomac Company. Shay's Rebellion, which occurred in Massachusetts in 1786, added to his conviction that a strong central government was needed in place of the Articles of Confederation. A delegate to the Federal Convention (1787), he served as its president; although admitting that the Constitution was not perfect, he pressed for its adoption. His aim now was to spend his life in quiet retirement at Mount Vernon, but he abandoned this purpose when he was called upon to become the first president of the new government. Characteristically, he acted from a sense of duty that guided him throughout his career as soldier and statesman. He took the oath of office (April 30, 1789) at New York, on the site now marked by the statue of Washington at the old Sub-Treasury Building on Wall Street. The chief problem facing his administration was the strengthening and survival of the young republic. In sum, this was initially based on America's financial stability and its corollary, the encouragement of manufacturing and commerce. His administration was troubled by the political warfare between the Federalists and the Republicans led, respectively, by Alexander Hamilton, secretary of the treasury, and Thomas Jefferson, secretary of state. With wisdom and statesmanship, Washington acted as the balancing lever between the two men, keeping them in the cabinet with appeals addressed to their patriotism. Although he was reelected without opposition, Washington's second administration was disturbed by sharp attacks upon his Federalist course of action. The steps he took were viewed by Washington solely in the light of their value as a means of buttressing the U.S. and assuring, as far as it lay within his powers, the permanence of the new government. An outstanding example of the conflict between the needs of national power and the demands made in the name of popular and local rights was the Whisky Rebellion (1794) in Pennsylvania. It was suppressed after Washington called out the militia. In 1796 he delivered his famous Farewell Address and in 1797 retired to Mount Vernon. When he left office, the U.S. had achieved a measure of dignity and repute among the nations of the world; to many abroad, it appeared as the hope of the new age in the affairs of humankind; at home, despite political wrangling between the Hamiltonian and Jeffersonian factions, credit and confidence had been restored. In 1798, when it seemed as if war with France was imminent, Washington emerged from retirement to accept from President John Adams the command of the provisional army. The war scare blew over, however, and Washington's end came not in service but at Mount Vernon, from complications which set in after a severe cold. His monument stands at the national capital which bears his name; in a larger sense, however, his monument is the American nation he served with quiet and enduring heroism. Later generations have differed in their interpretation of his administration's policies, but no one has ever seriously questioned Washington's sincerity and devotion to the cause of American nationhood or to the popular title, "father of his country." Washington, Martha. b. in New Kent County, Va., June 21, 1731; d. at "Mount Vernon," near Alexandria, Va., May 22, 1802. Wife of George Washington. She was the daughter of Colonel John Dandridge, a planter, and in June, 1749, married Daniel Parke Custis, a planter, who died in 1757, leaving his widow one of the wealthiest women in Virginia. She married Washington in January, 1759. She had by her first husband four children, two of whom died in infancy; the third, Martha Parke Custis, died at the age of 16; the fourth, John Parke Custis (d. 1781), left four children, the two younger of whom, Eleanor Parke Custis and George Washington Parke Custis, were adopted by George Washington. She had no children by the latter.

Washington, Mount. Highest summit of the White Mountains, in New Hampshire, and the highest mountain in New England. It is ascended by a cog railroad, and a road 8 mi. long. On the summit are a U.S. weather station and an inn. Elevation, 6,288 ft.

Washington, Treaty of. Treaty between Great Britain and the U.S., signed on May 8, 1871, which provided for the settlement of the Alabama claims by the Geneva tribunal, and for the settlement of the northwest boundary (San Juan Islands) and fisheries dispute.

Washington Benevolent Society. Organization established (1808) at New York which was active in promoting those principles of government associated with the Federalist Party. Its chief stronghold was the New England region. It went out of existence during the 1820's.

Washington Conference. International conference which met at Washington, D.C., on Nov. 12, 1921, for the purpose of discussing Far Eastern problems and the limitation of naval armaments. Called under U.S. and British auspices, it was attended by the U.S., Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, China, Portugal, Belgium, and The Netherlands. The conference, which remained in session until February, 1922, resulted in the Four-Power, Five-Power, and Nine-Power Treaties concerning Far Eastern questions and the fixing of naval construction programs.

Washington Conference. Conference held at Washington, D.C., soon after the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941. The discussions which took place at this time were the first held between President F. D. Roosevelt and Prime Minister Winston Churchill after the U.S. entered World War II. The most important results of the conference were the establishment of a joint command for Allied forces and the formation of the United Nations coalition on Jan. 1, 1942.

Washington Monument. National memorial to George Washington at Washington, D.C. The hollow obelisk-shaped tower of white marble rises 555 ft., $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches from its 55-ft. square base to its pointed apex. During Washington's lifetime, Congress approved a resolution to erect an equestrian statue of him in the new federal city, and L'Enfant's plans included a site for such a memorial, but Washington demurred at the expense and the plan was dropped. After his death in 1799, the matter of a memorial to him was much discussed, but no action was taken. In 1832, the centennial year of Washington's birth, the Washington National Monument Society was formed. Funds were raised, and blocks of stone were received from each state of the Union, from some foreign governments, and from individuals. In 1836 a design by Robert Mills (later simplified) was accepted, but Congress did not get around to designating a site until 1843, in which year the cornerstone was laid on July 4. By 1854, 156 ft. of the shaft had arisen. In that year a block of marble from the Temple of Concord in Rome, a gift of Pope Pius IX, was stolen; public excitement and controversy over this occurrence caused a practical cessation of public contributions, and work was halted; during the Civil War the project was lost sight of; and not until the celebration of the national centennial in 1876 made the lack of a monument to the Father of his Country in the city bearing his name something of a scandal, did Congress appropriate funds for the completion of the project by army engineers. The construction was completed in 1884, the capstone being set in place on December 6. The monument was dedicated on Feb. 21, 1885, and opened to the public on Oct. 9, 1888. Rising above a slight knoll, the monument is surrounded by a wide expanse of lawn, an extension of the Mall down which an uninterrupted view is had of the Capitol to the east; the White House amid its extensive grounds is almost due north, the Lincoln Memorial is due west, the Jefferson Memorial, across the Tidal Basin, almost directly south. Five hundred feet above the ground is an interior observation platform from which, through eight windows, a superb view of the city and of the surrounding country is had. The platform can be reached by a circular staircase of 898 steps, which since 1888 have been climbed by approximately four million persons; in later years, however, an elevator was installed, and upwards of 24 million visitors have, by the one means or the other, made the ascent.

Wasp (wosp). American ship of war, 18 guns, built at Washington in 1806. On Oct. 13, 1812, she sailed from the Delaware River under command of Captain Jacob Jones, with 137 men. On Oct. 18, she fell in with six merchantmen under convoy of the British brig Frolic, 18 guns and 110 men. The action began at 11:32 A.M. and the Frolic struck at 12:15 P.M. It was fought in a very heavy sea. Both ships were captured the same day by the Poictiers (British, 74 guns).

Wasp. U.S. ship-rigged sloop of war, 22 guns and 160 men, built at Newburyport, Mass., in 1814. She left Portsmouth, May 1, 1814, under Captain Johnston Blakeley, and ran into the English Channel. On June 28 she fell in with the British sloop Reindeer, 18 guns and 118 men. The battle began at 3:17 P.M. and the Reindeer struck at 3:44. On Sept. 1, she met the British brig Avon, 18 guns. The battle began at 8:38 P.M. and the Avon struck at 10:12. On Oct. 9, she spoke and boarded the Swedish brig Adams and took out of her Lieutenant McKnight and a master's mate, late of the U.S. ship Essex, on their way from Brazil to England. The Wasp was never heard from again.

Wassermann (wös'er.man; German, wäs'er.män), August von. b. at Bamberg, Germany, Feb. 21, 1866; d. at Berlin, March 16, 1925. German bacteriologist. He was assistant (1890) at the Robert Koch Institute of Infectious Diseases, and became privatdozent in 1901, professor in 1902, and full professor in 1911. He was director (1913) of the Institute for Experimental Therapy of the Kaiser Wilhelm Gesellschaft at Dahlem, near Berlin, was a coworker of P. Ehrlich, and worked on immunology in collaboration with R. Pfeiffer, L. Brieger, C. Bruck, and J. Citron. His most important contribution was his discovery (1906) in serology of the complement fixation test for the diagnosis of syphilis (the Wassermann test or reaction).

Wassermann, Jakob. b. at Fürth, Germany, March 10, 1873; d. 1934. German novelist. He gave an account of himself in Mein Weg als Deutscher und Jude (1921) and Selbstbetrachtungen (1933), and of his art in Die Kunst der Erzählung (1904). One of his most readable short works is Der Aufruhr um den Junker Ernst (1926). The theme here, as in most of his stories, involves a heroic effort to rescue injured innocents (Caspar Hauser, 1908; Der Fall Maurizius, 1928; Ezel Andergast, 1931). His novel Christian Wahnschaffe (1919) was translated into English as The World's Illusion (1920), and brought Wassermann great popularity in America.

Waste Land, The. Poem in five parts by T. S. Eliot, published in 1922. The theme of the poem is the sterility and confusion of the 20th century. The symbolism, deriving from pagan fertility myths and the legend of the Grail, is projected against the "Waste Land," a barren country under the rule of an impotent king. The first part, The Burial of the Dead, presents spring and summer as forces making the world awaken to its inadequacies and desolation. The Game of Chess shows people preoccupied with modern superficiality and oblivious to the heritage of the past. The Fire Sermon sets forth the squalor of the contemporary scene. Death by Water translates the drowning of a Phoenician sailor into a redemptive symbol. What the Thunder Said presents the fall of modern Europe caused by a lack of spiritual values. The poem, full of esoteric allusion and one of the most controversial of its time, exerted a profound influence on the poets of the following generation.

Waterford. [Irish, Port (or Phort) Láirge.] County of the Irish Republic, in Munster province, bounded on the N by Counties Tipperary and Kilkenny, on the NE by Waterford Harbour and County Wexford, on the S by St. George's Channel, and on the W by County Cork. The dangerous, low coast is irregular and deeply indented by several bays and harbors. Most of the surface is hilly or mountainous, especially in the N part, where are found the ranges of the Knockmeadow, Comeragh, and Monavullagh Mountains. The chief minerals are copper and marble, both of which are worked to some extent. Fishing, especially shellfishing, is important along the coast. The E part of the county is flat, and is one of the most important dairying regions of Ireland. Large quantities of butter and bacon are exported by the county. Waterford is the county seat; area, ab. 710 sq. mi.; pop. 75,062 (1951).

Waterford. [Irish, Port (or Phort) Láirge.] City, county borough, and seaport in the Irish Republic, in Munster province, county seat of County Waterford, on the river Suir at the head of Waterford Harbour, ab. 29 mi. W of Wexford. The port is accessible to small vessels (up to 2,000 tons), and was the chief cross-channel port for goods to and from Great Britain before the rise of Dublin to its present rank. The commerce of Waterford has now declined. Its exports consist of livestock, oats, and timber; imports consist mainly of coal and general cargo. During the 14th century Waterford was one of the four ports in Ireland from which export of staple goods was permitted by Edward III. The city has a bacon-curing industry, and lies in one of the greatest dairying regions in Ireland. Waterford was an ancient Danish stronghold, was taken by Strongbow in 1171, received a charter from King John, was unsuccessfully attacked by Cromwell in 1649, and was taken by Ireton in 1650. Pop. 28,689 (1951).

Waterloo, Battle of. Decisive victory gained near Waterloo (a village south of Brussels), June 18, 1815, by the Allies over Napoleon. The Prussians often call the battle Belle Alliance and the French Mont St.-Jean, after localities near Waterloo. The French numbered about 72,000; the allied British, Dutch, and Germans, under Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington, numbered about 67,000; the Prussians (about 50,000 additional), under Gebhard Leberecht von Blücher, marched to the battlefield and took part in the close and in the pursuit. Napoleon, who was attempting to defeat these forces before they could invade France simultaneously with the Austrians and Russians on the east, had driven between Wellington and Blücher. Detaching Grouchy to hold Blücher's forces, he supported Ney against Wellington. The battle commenced about 11:30 A.M. The features were the unavailing charges of the French and the stubborn resistance of the British contingent, and the last charge of the French Old Guard in the evening, which failed and was followed by an advance of the combined armies, Blücher having come up from the east and driven back the French right. The Allies lost about 22,000; the French about 35,000, besides many prisoners. The rout was so complete and the disaster to Napoleon so decisive that "Waterloo" is proverbial for a final and deciding blow. The preliminary battles were on June 16 at Ligny and Quatre-Bras, both being French victories, though Wellington was at first victorious in the latter battle.

Under his own name he wrote various religious works.

Watson, John Broadus. b. at Greenville, S.C., Jan. 9, 1878—. American psychologist. He was professor and director of the psychological laboratory at Johns Hopkins (1908-20), and editor (1908-27) of The Psychological Review. Watson is the developer of the school of behaviorism, which limits itself to the actual responses to stimuli and does not attempt to account for such responses on the basis of mind or consciousness; the application of the behaviorist approach in the field of animal psychology has been rewarding, since it does away with anthropomorphic theories of animal behavior. Author of Animal Education (1903), Behavior (1914), Behaviorism (1925), Ways of Behaviorism (1928), Psychological Care of Infant and Child (1928), and other books.

Watson, John Christian. b. at Valparaiso, Chile, April 9, 1867; d. Nov. 18, 1941. Australian political leader, first Labour prime minister of the commonwealth. He was taken to New Zealand as a child and after a state school education became a printer. He went to Australia in 1886.

He became prominent in labor union affairs, entered the New South Wales legislative assembly in 1894, entered the federal house of representatives (1901), and became leader of the parliamentary Labour Party. He became prime minister and treasurer in 1904. He was later defeated on a "preference for unionists" clause in an arbitration bill; nevertheless, he exerted power over the second Deakin ministry from his party position in the house. He resigned the party leadership (1907) and retired from politics (1910). He was pro-conscriptionist in 1916 and was dropped from the Labour Party.

Watson, John Crittenden. b. at Frankfort, Ky., Aug. 24, 1842; d. Dec. 14, 1923. American naval officer. He was graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in 1860 and served through the Civil War, taking part in the fighting below New Orleans, the passage of the Vicksburg batteries, the battle of Mobile Bay, and others. He was promoted commodore in 1897 and during the war with Spain (1898) commanded the blockading squadron on the north coast of Cuba, in May-June; on June 27 he was placed in command of the eastern squadron. From June 15, 1899, to April 19, 1900, he was commander in chief on the eastern station.

Watson, John Fanning. b. at Batsto, N.J., June 13, 1779; d. Dec. 23, 1860. American antiquary and publisher. He established (1809) a bookstore at Philadelphia, where he was also active in the publication of books and periodicals. Retiring (1814) from this field, he became cashier of the Bank of Germantown, where he served until 1847, and was secretary and treasurer (1847-59) of the Philadelphia, Germantown and Norristown Railroad. He compiled the Annals of Philadelphia (1830), Annals and Occurrences of New York City and State (1846), and other antiquarian works.

Watson, Richard. b. at Heversham, Westmorland, England, 1737; d. July 2, 1816. English prelate, theological writer, and chemist. He was regius professor of divinity at Cambridge (1771 et seq.) and bishop of Llandaff (1782). He wrote an Apology for Christianity (1776, in answer to Edward Gibbon), an Apology for the Bible (1796, in answer to Thomas Paine), and others. He was a chemical experimenter and suggested (1787) gunpowder improvements reported to have saved the government 100,000 pounds a year.

Watson, Robert William Seton. See Seton-Watson, Robert William.

Watson, Sereno. b. at East Windsor Hill, Conn., Dec. 1, 1826; d. at Cambridge, Mass., March 9, 1892. American botanist. He became (1867) a member of the exploring expedition to the Great Basin led by Clarence King, of which he subsequently became the botanist. His extensive collections were a model for their time, and his Bolany (1871), an important contribution, is usually referred to as the Bolany of the King Expedition. He became (1873) assistant at the Gray Herbarium (Cambridge, Mass.), of which he subsequently served as curator (1874-92), he collaborated in the preparation of the monumental Bolany of California (2 vols., 1876, 1880), completed the Manual of the Mosses of North America (1884), and with John Merle Coulter revised (1889) Asa Gray's Manual of Bolany.

Watson, Thomas. b. probably at London, c1557; d. there, in September, 1592. English poet and translator. Author of Latin translations of the Argonne (1581), of Sophocles, and of the Amyntas (1585) of Tasso. In English he wrote Hecatompathia, or Passionate Century of Love (1592), a collection of so-called sonnets (although each contains 18 lines), and Tears of Fancie (1593), a true sonnet sequence. He wrote, in both Latin and English, an Elogue (1590) on the death of his patron, Sir Francis Walsingham. Watson's work shows his thorough knowledge of Latin, Greek, French, and Italian literature. Of his poems, those beginning "If Cupid were a child," "Ev'ry singing bird that in the wood rejoices," "I saw the object of my pining thought," "In clouds she shines," and "If Jove himself be subject unto love" are characteristic of his talent. Watson is the "Amyntas" of Edmund Spenser's poetic allegory Colin Clouts Come Home Again.

Watson, Thomas Augustus. b. at Salem, Mass., Jan. 18, 1854; d. at Passargille Key, Fla., Dec. 13, 1934. American telephone technician and shipbuilder, a one-time technical assistant (1874-77) to Alexander Graham Bell. He was research and technical director (c1877-81) of the Bell Telephone Company, and subsequently (with Frank O. Wellington) established a shipyard at East Braintree, Mass., which obtained (1896 et seq.) numerous U.S. destroyer and battleship contracts. The yard was incorporated (1901) as the Fore River Ship and Engine Company.

Watson, Thomas Edward. b. in Columbia County, Ga., Sept. 5, 1856; d. Sept. 26, 1922. American politician, editor, and author. He was admitted to the bar in 1875, and was a member of the Georgia legislature (1882-83) and member of Congress (1891-93). He was nominated for vice-president at the St. Louis Populist convention which endorsed W. J. Bryan for president in 1896, and was nominated for president by the People's Party in 1904. He was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1920. He published at Atlanta The People's Party Paper, in 1905 began the publication of Tom Watson's Magazine at New York, and from 1906 published Watson's Jeffersonian Magazine and The Weekly Jeffersonian. He also published The Story of France (1899), Napoleon (1902), Life and Times of Thomas Jefferson (1903), Behany, a Study and Story of the Old South (1904), Life and Speeches (1908), Political and Economic Handbook (1908), Waterloo (1908), and others. Watson, a Jeffersonian liberal in national politics, became notorious in his later years for his outspoken prejudice against Negroes, Jews, and Roman Catholics.

Watson, Sir William. [Full name, John William Watson.] b. at Wharfedale, Yorkshire, England, Aug. 2, 1858; d. at Ditchling Common, Sussex, England, Aug. 11, 1935. English poet. His poem Wordsworth's Grave (1890) drew attention to him, and in 1892 he received a civil pension of 200 pounds rendered vacant by the death of Tennyson. His Lachrymae Musarum (1892) was the finest elegy written on the death of the latter. He also wrote Ode on the Day of the Coronation of King Edward VII (1902) and The Tomb of Burns (1903). He had previously published Love Lyrics, The Prince's Quest, Epigrams of Art, Life, and Nature; and he also published The Eloquent Angels (1893), Excursions in Criticism, Odes and Other Poems (1894), The Purple East (1896), The Hope of the World (1897), For England (1903), Sable and Purple (1910), The Heralds of the Dawn (1912), The Man Who Saw and Other Poems Arising Out of the War (1917), The Superhuman Antagonists (1919), and others. The often violent political opinions expressed in his poetry are thought to have prevented his appointment to the laureateship after Alfred Austin's death in 1913.

Watt (wot), James. b. at Greenock, Scotland, Jan. 19, 1736; d. at Heathfield, near Birmingham, England, Aug. 25, 1819. British mechanician, inventor, and civil engineer. He was apprenticed to an instrument-maker in London in 1755, became mathematical-instrument maker to the University of Glasgow in 1757, began experiments in improving the steam engine about 1760 after he had repaired the university's working model of Thomas Newcomen's engine, and invented the condensing steam engine in 1765 and obtained a patent in 1769. Many other improvements were devised later and patented. He formed a partnership with Matthew Boulton in Birmingham and began the manufacture of steam engines in 1775. The watt, a unit of power, is named for him. Watt is the hero of a completely apocryphal story in which he obtained insight into the motive power of steam by watching, as a child, the lid of a teakettle move up and down.

Wayland Smith (smith). In English folklore, a supernatural smith who once dwelt at an old stone mountain near Ashdown in Berkshire. If a horse had cast a shoe, it was only necessary to lead him thither, place a piece of money on the stone, and retire for a time. Upon returning the money would be gone and the horse shod. The legend of Wayland, the wonderful smith, is common and ancient Germanic property. In the Anglo-Saxon Beowulf, a precious piece of armor is called Welandes geweorc (Weland's work). He is equated to Volund, the Old Norse divine smith, and his deeds are the subject of the Völundar Kvíða (Lay of Volund) in the Old Icelandic Elder Edda. In the Old Norse Vilkinsa Saga, he was taught his mysterious skill by the smith Mimir. Swedish legend locates his grave near Siseback in Scania. Scott introduces him as a character in Kenilworth.

Weald (wēld), the. Area in SE England, generally oval-shaped, enclosed by the North and South Downs. It begins at Folkestone Hill, near the Strait of Dover, passes through the counties of Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, and Sussex, meeting the sea again at Beachy Head. It embraces the SW part of Kent, the S part of Surrey, the N and NE parts of Sussex, and a small part of the E side of Hampshire. The surface is hilly in the C part, the uplands usually in woodland or heath. This region forms the remnant of an originally much greater forest, known to the early English as Andredesweald (from which the name). It supported an important iron-working industry from the 14th to the 18th century. It is now an important agricultural area, especially for dairy cattle, poultry, and fruit.

Wealth of Nations, An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the. Chief work of Adam Smith, published in 1776. It is regarded as the foundation of the modern science of political economy and, with the possible exception of Karl Marx's Das Kapital, has had the greatest influence of any book on economics ever published. It espoused the laissez faire system, that is, it opposed outside interference in economic matters and thus opposed the mercantilist-protectionist view of wealth consisting of bullion and "balance of trade." To Smith, value arose from the labor required to produce rather than in some extrinsic criterion; he argued that this value should operate in the market without interference. Such ideas were widespread at the time, but Smith, stating them in England when he did, brought about a reexamination of economic policies and the eventual adoption by England of free trade.

She translated into English verse the Prometheus Bound (1866) of Aeschylus and the Medea (1868) of Euripides, and wrote essays on translating poetry.

Webster, Daniel. b. at Salisbury, N.H., Jan. 18, 1782; d. at Marshfield, Mass., Oct. 24, 1852. American statesman, lawyer, and orator. His parents were far from affluent, and it was only because Daniel's health in childhood was delicate that he was not early put to work but was given a good education, culminating in his graduation from Dartmouth College in his native state, in 1801. As a schoolboy, the studies in which he was weakest were writing and declamation, but at Dartmouth he acquired assurance as an orator, developing a florid style which long continued to mark his public speeches. Leaving college, he became a schoolmaster, but not for long; presently he was studying the law, and in 1805, at Boston, was admitted to the bar. Despite the greater opportunities offered by Boston, he first hung out his shingle at Boscowen, N.H., to be near his ailing father. After the latter's death, he practiced for a time at Portsmouth, N.H., and during this period began his political career. Paternal and other early influences inclined him to conservatism; the French Revolution frightened him; he recoiled from Jeffersonian democratism; and, as a New Englander, he resented President Jefferson's Embargo Act of 1807. It was accordingly as a Federalist that he was elected to Congress in 1812, and he went to Washington with the purpose of embarrassing the Democratic administration of President Madison. He opposed the War of 1812, refused to vote for taxes to support it, and suggested that a state might have the right to nullify a federal law. He rejected, however, all thought of disrupting the Union, and counseled the governor of New Hampshire against appointment of delegates to the Hartford Convention. Re-elected to Congress in 1814, before the end of his second term in 1817 he moved to Boston, correctly perceiving that his talents required a larger field than New Hampshire could afford. Yet it was in a case affecting his alma mater, Dartmouth College, that he first won national renown as a lawyer. The college, dominated by Federalist trustees, became involved in politics. The New Hampshire legislature, controlled by Democrats (then still known as Republicans), amended the college charter to put the institution under public control. This action was upheld by the New Hampshire supreme court, but in 1819 the Supreme Court of the U.S. reversed the decision, adopting Webster's view of the inviolability of a contract. His prestige as a lawyer was enhanced when, in that same year, the federal Supreme Court again supported him in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, in which he defended the Bank of the United States against the attempt of a state to tax it. Webster served briefly in the Massachusetts house of representatives in 1822, but in that same year was elected to the federal House of Representatives, where he sat until his election, as a Whig, to the U.S. Senate in 1827. Webster was one of the originators of the Whig Party, which took form in the late 1820's and the 1830's as a coalition of expediency between rather diverse groups, North and South, whose common grounds were opposition to the Jacksonian Democratic Party and devotion to vested interests. Webster had opposed the tariff laws of 1816 and 1824, which were detrimental to New England interests at that time; but under the stimulus of the latter of these enactments New England rapidly developed a manufacturing industry, and by the time a new tariff law was proposed in 1828 he had become a stockholder in a textile company and an ardent advocate of protection, as he thereafter remained. In the Senate, Webster opposed President Jackson's attack upon the Bank of the United States (Webster's client), but stood with the president against Southern attempts at nullification of federal laws and intimations of a breach of the Union. The most famous of all of Webster's speeches was the "Reply to Hayne" (Robert Young Hayne, senator from South Carolina), in January, 1830, with its moving climactic plea for "liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable!" In 1841 Webster left the Senate and became secretary of state under the first Whig president, William Henry Harrison, retaining the post when, upon Harrison's death, John Tyler succeeded to the presidency. When in September, 1841, following President Tyler's vetoes of bills to establish a national bank with branches in the states, all other members of the cabinet resigned, Webster retained his portfolio in order to consummate the negotiations with Great Britain which resulted in the Webster-Ashburton Treaty settling certain questions concerning the U.S.-Canada boundary, and providing for joint action to suppress the slave trade. In 1843 he resigned from the cabinet, and thereafter served again in the Senate (1845-50), where he opposed the annexation of Texas and the war with Mexico. His position on these issues, like his stand against nullification and secession, and his sincere if somewhat academic disapproval of slavery, made him one of the leaders to whom Northern antislavery forces looked for eventual abolition of the South's "peculiar institution"; but with the threat of dissolution of the Union growing ever more ominous, Webster, in his famous "Seventh of March speech," supported the Compromise of 1850, which included a strengthened fugitive slave law. But majority opinion in the North would no longer tolerate slave hunting, and Webster's prestige fell sharply; the Abolitionists turned upon him wrathfully; John Greenleaf Whittier lamented his defection in a powerful poem, Ichabod. As early as 1836 Webster had been put forward by the Whigs of Massachusetts as a candidate for President of the United States, and had received the electoral vote of that state. Thereafter he was in fact an avowed or potential presidential candidate at each recurring election, and his ambition naturally affected his political course, especially in the direction of compromises calculated to keep the Northern and Southern wings of the Whig Party together. Webster, who had adopted a rather grandiose and expensive style of living, was in effect, it has been said, a kind of pensioner of the Northern industrial interests, to whom it was of the first importance to keep the Southern Whigs in line for the policy of protection; but for this support the Southern Whigs demanded the price of a compromise on the slavery issue. Under President Fillmore, Webster served again as secretary of state (1850-52), in that capacity notably asserting the right of the U.S. to recognize the independence of peoples who, like the Hungarians, renounced allegiance to foreign imperial masters. In 1852 he made his last bid for a presidential nomination; before the end of the year he was dead. Webster, of so swarthy a complexion that he was nicknamed "Black Dan," was a man of impressive appearance, with a crazy face and deep-set eyes. In 1839 he visited Great Britain and the Continent, and Thomas Carlyle, who met him, wrote to Ralph Waldo Emerson that America could say of him, "Here is our Yankee Englishman; such limbs we grow in Yankee-land!" Much of his fame rested on the many occasional orations he delivered, such as that in 1820 in celebration of the second centennial of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth; the first and second Bunker Hill Monument orations, at the laying of the cornerstone in 1825 and at the dedication in 1843; the oration on the deaths of Thomas Jefferson and John Adams in 1826; and the speech at the laying of the cornerstone of the addition to the national Capitol in 1851. These were not among the occasions when to some of his auditors it seemed that Webster's addiction to good living, including good liquor and good wine, added an extra florid touch to his eloquence. Very much a man of his place and time, inevitably constrained not only to serve the pure ideals of the republic but to take a stand with one or another of the forces arising in a rapidly evolving society and a rapidly expanding economy, Webster chose to stand with the new industrial aristocracy, and though he became their idol, by the same token he failed to arouse affection or devotion among the working masses, and never achieved the popular leadership which might have led him to the goal of his ambition, the presidency of the U.S.

Webster, Daniel Fletcher. b. 1813; killed at the second battle of Bull Run, Aug. 30, 1862. American army officer; son of Daniel Webster. He was a colonel in the Civil War.

Webster, Harold Tucker. b. at Parkersburg, W. Va., Sept. 21, 1885; d. at Stamford, Conn., Sept. 22, 1952. American cartoonist. He studied art at Chicago and afterwards worked for the Denver Republican, the Chicago Daily News, the Chicago Inter-Ocean, the Cincinnati Post, and the New York Tribune. In 1925 he became associated with the New York World, where his daily strip The Man in the Brown Derby, built about happenings in a middle-class household, became popular. With The World and with the New York Herald Tribune, Webster also drew single-panel cartoons, such as the various series entitled Life's Darkest Moment, The Thrill That Comes Once in a Lifetime, The Boy Who Made Good, How to Torture Your Wife, and The Unseen Audience. His best-known cartoons were entitled The Timid Soul, and their hero, Caspar Milquetoast, became the symbol of the average man who is stepped on by more extroverted people.

Webster, Henry Kittell. b. at Evanston, Ill., Sept. 7, 1875; d. Dec. 8, 1932. American novelist. Author of The Story of a Corner in Land (1900), Roger Drake, Captain of Industry (1903), The Duke of Cameron Avenue (1904), The Whispering Man (1908), The Girl in the Other Seat (1911), The Real Adventure (1916), An American Family (1918), The Quartz Eye (1928), The Sealed Trunk (1929), and Who Is Next? (1931).

He was the founder of the Société des Amis des Vieux Moulins, an organization for the preservation of old windmills in France.

Webster, Jean. [Full name, Alice Jane Chandler Webster.] b. at Fredonia, N.Y., July 24, 1876; d. June 11, 1916. American writer. She contributed to magazines and wrote a series of books revolving around the character of "Patty"; these included When Patty Went to College (1903) and Just Patty (1911). Her best-known work is Daddy-Long-Legs (1912) and its sequel, Dear Enemy (1914). Among her other works are Jerry Junior (1907), The Four Pools Mystery (1908), and Much Ado about Peter (1909).

Webster, John. fl. in the first part of the 17th century (1602-24). English dramatist, noted for his tragedies. Little is known of his biography. He assisted Thomas Dekker, Michael Drayton, Thomas Middleton, and others in writing plays (c1602) for Philip Henslowe. He published, with Dekker, Northward Ho! (1607), Westward Ho! (1607), and The History of Sir Thomas Wyatt (played in 1607). The Weakest Goeth to the Wall (1600) is attributed, without authority, to him. His finest plays are The White Devil (printed 1612) and The Duchess of Malfi (printed 1623). He also wrote The Devil's Law Case (1623), a city pageant (1624), and Appius and Virginia (probably, with Thomas Heywood and not printed till 1654). Two plays are attributed to Webster and William Rowley: A Cure for a Cuckold (maybe also with Heywood) and A Thracian Wonder (both printed in 1661). Several other plays, written in collaboration, are believed to contain his work.

Webster, Margaret. b. at New York, March 15, 1905-. American actress and director; daughter of May Whitty. She played (1924) with Sybil Thorndike in The Trojan Women, made her London debut (1925) with John Barrymore in Hamlet, and toured (1926) with the Macdonna Players, starring in 16 of George Bernard Shaw's plays. She directed Richard II (1937-38, 1940), Henry IV (1938), and Hamlet (1938-40) at New York, starring Maurice Evans, staged, directed, and acted in Family Portrait (1939), and directed (1943) Othello with Paul Robeson. Author of Shakespeare Without Tears (1942).

Webster, Noah. b. at West Hartford, Conn., Oct. 16, 1758; d. at New Haven, Conn., May 28, 1843. American lexicographer. He was a son of a farmer and a descendant of a Massachusetts governor who migrated to America before 1633. While at Yale College he participated briefly as a soldier in the Revolutionary War, and after taking his B.A. on Sept. 9, 1778, he became a schoolmaster at Hartford and Litchfield, Conn., and also studied law. Admitted to the bar in 1781, he mingled law and teaching. Aware of the inadequate provision for the education of children and inspired by a cultural nativism, he formulated nationalistic principles for the renovation of school methods. To develop an American patriotism, he published in 1783 his famous "Blue-Backed Speller," which is still in print in a revised form and has sold upwards of 100 million copies, making it the best seller of all American books. A grammar and reader followed in succeeding years, the three books forming A Grammatical Institute of the English Language (1783-85). Webster believed that "America must be as independent in literature as she is in politics, as famous for arts as for arms." Copyright laws were not then in existence in the newly independent U.S. and so Webster toured the country to request protection for his and other native books. On his journey he distributed Sketches of American Policy (1785), a vigorous plea for a national government. Remaining at Philadelphia in 1787 during the Constitutional Convention, he supported the conclusions of the framers of the new Federal Union, and then a year later at New York edited The American Magazine. In public lectures he advocated a national language, a thesis he explained in Dissertations on the English Language (1789) and A Collection of Essays and Fugitive Writings (1790). In The Prompter (1791) he published a group of moralizing essays in the simple style of Cotton Mather's Essays To Do Good. Following his marriage in October, 1789, and nearly four years' practice as a lawyer at Hartford, he became in August, 1793, the editor of New York's first daily newspaper, The American Minerva. Disdaining political acrimony, he retired to New Haven in 1798 to write on yellow fever and to prepare A Brief History of Epidemic and Pestilential Diseases (1799). Following the preparation of several textbooks, he edited A Compendious Dictionary of the English Language (1806) and its abridgment, A Dictionary . . . for the Use of the Common Schools (1807). Undeterred by taunts at his simplified spelling and emphasis on American words, he prepared in two volumes An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828), the basis for the Merriam-Webster unabridged dictionaries. Besides writing textbooks and editing a bowdlerized edition of the Bible (1833), Webster participated in politics in Connecticut and at Amherst, Mass., where he resided from 1812 to 1822 and

- where he helped to found Amherst College. His fame rests upon his spelling book, which gave the U.S. "a unity of language no other people possess," and his unabridged dictionary. "A born definer of words," he advanced lexicographical science by his monumental work, and today "Webster" and "dictionary" are synonymous terms. His other books include Miscellaneous Papers (1802), Rights of Neutrals (1802), A Philosophical and Practical Grammar of the English Language (1807), History of the United States (1832), and Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects (1843).
- Webster, Pelatiah. b. at Lebanon, Conn., Nov. 24, 1726; d. Sept. 2, 1795. American merchant and political economist. He was graduated (1746) from Yale, served (1749-55) as a preacher, and became (1755) a merchant at Philadelphia. Beginning in 1776, his articles on finance, commerce, taxation policies, and political subjects appeared in the Philadelphia journals. Author of A Dissertation on the Political Union and Constitution of the Thirteen United States of North-America (1783), a work which some have singled out as the original scheme of the government embodied (1787) in the federal Constitution. He also wrote Political Essays on the Nature and Operation of Money, Public Finances, and Other Subjects; Published during the American War (1791).
- Webster, Sir Richard Everard. [Title, Viscount Alverstone.] b. Dec. 22, 1842; d. at Cranleigh, Surrey, England, Dec. 15, 1915. English jurist. He was called to the bar in 1868, and was made a queen's counsel in 1878. He was a member of the House of Commons (1885-1900), attorney general (1885, 1886-92, and 1895-1900), and lord chief justice of England (1900 et seq.).
- Webster-Ashburton Treaty (web'ster.ash'ber'ton). Treaty concluded at Washington, D.C., Aug. 9, 1842, between Great Britain and the U.S. The present boundary between Maine and Canada was established, and provision was made for the suppression of the African slave trade and the mutual extradition of fugitives from justice. The commissioners were Alexander Baring, 1st Baron Ashburton, for Great Britain, and Daniel Webster for the U.S.

- Weckherlin (vek'ér.lin), Georg Rudolf. b. at Stuttgart, Germany, Sept. 15, 1584; d. at London, Feb. 13, 1653. German poet. His services to Duke John Frederick of Württemberg were in part those of a court poet, but he also was sent on political missions to France and England. He settled in England after 1620 and was in the service of James I and Charles I. In 1644 in England he was named "Secretary for Foreign Tongues," a post which he had to give up to John Milton in 1649. Later, when Milton became blind, he was called back to this work. Weckherlin to some extent anticipated the work of Martin Opitz; he was one of the first Germans to write sonnets.
- Weckmann (vek'män), Matthias. b. probably at Oppershausen, Thuringia, Germany, 1621; d. at Hamburg, Germany, 1674. German composer, organist (1640 et seq.) at Dresden and a founder of the Collegium Musicum. His extant works consist of religious concertos and organ works.

- Wedderburn, James. b. at Dundee, Scotland, c1495; d. in France, 1553. Scottish poet and dramatist, author of anti-Roman Catholic ballads; brother of John Wedderburn and Robert Wedderburn. Author of The Bedchamber of John the Baptist (1539-40), a tragedy, and Brionius the Tyrant, a comedy (1539-40), satires on practices in the Roman Catholic Church. With his brothers, John and Robert, he wrote several satirical ballads later published in book form as Ane Compendious Booke of Godly and Spiritual Songs (1567). Charged with heresy, he escaped to France.
- Wedderburn, John. b. at Dundee, Scotland, c1500; d. in England, 1546. Scottish poet, author of anti-Roman Catholic ballads; brother of James Wedderburn and Robert Wedderburn. Charged with heresy for writing ballads attacking the Roman Catholic Church, he escaped (1540) to Wittenberg. He returned (1542) to Scotland, continuing to write and publish his so-called Dundee Psalms. He fled (1546) to England.
- Wedderburn, Robert. b. at Dundee, Scotland, c1510; d. there, c1537. Scottish poet, author of anti-Roman Catholic ballads; brother of James Wedderburn and John Wedderburn. He joined his brothers in writing the ballads that brought a charge of heresy and fled (c1534) to Paris and later to Wittenberg. Returning to Scotland in 1546, he was made vicar of Dundee.
- Weddigen (ved'igen), Otto. b. at Herford, Germany, Sept. 15, 1882; presumed lost with his ship in the North Sea, March 18, 1915. German submarine commander who torpedoed (Sept. 22, 1914) the British cruisers Hogue, Aboukir, and Cecily, and, on Oct. 15, 1914, the cruiser Hawke.
- Wedekind (vä'de.kint), Benjamin Franklin. b. at Hanover, Germany, July 24, 1864; d. at Munich, March 9, 1918. German dramatist, a forerunner of the expressionists. His works, taken as a whole, reveal a deep resentment of the hypocrisies of society. He found these most revolting in sexual matters; hence his long list of dramas devoted to problems of eroticism (Frühlings Erwachen, 1891; Der Erdgeist, 1895; Die Büchse der Pandora, 1904; Halsäde, 1904; Schloss Wetterstein, 1910; and others). The one-act Der Kammergänger (1900) poses questions about society's treatment of the artist, as does König Nicolo (1907). The action of Der Marquis von Keith (1900) centers about a swindler.
- Wedel (vä'del). Town in NW Germany, in the Land (state) of Schleswig-Holstein, British Zone, formerly in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, situated near the Elbe River, ab. 9 mi. - Wedemeyer (wed'e.mi.ér), Albert Coady. b. at Omaha, Neb., July 9, 1897—. American soldier. He served on the general staff of the U.S. army (1941-43), was commissioned brigadier general in 1942 and major general in 1943, and in the latter year was assigned to the Southeast Asia theater of war, and made deputy chief of staff to the Allied commander in that area, Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten. With the removal in October, 1944, of General Joseph W. Stilwell as commander of U.S. armed forces in China, that command was given to General Wedemeyer, and held by him until 1946. He was made a lieutenant general in 1945. In July, 1947, Wedemeyer returned to China on orders of President Truman to appraise and report on the confused and critical situation in that country. The Wedemeyer report was long withheld from the public, but in August, 1947, the general criticized the Chiang Kai-shek government for corruption. Nevertheless, before the Senate Appropriations Committee in December of that year, he urged continued support of it on the ground that its fight against the Chinese Communists was more important than its faults. During the MacArthur hearings before a Senate committee (May-June, 1951), General Wedemeyer agreed with General Douglas MacArthur's opinions on U.S. policy concerning China. Wedemeyer was director of plans and operations on the army general staff (1947-48), deputy chief of staff of the army (1948), and commanding general of the Sixth Army (1949-51). In 1951 he entered private business.

Weems (wēnz), Mason Locke. b. at Marshes Seat, Herring Bay, Anne Arundel County, Md., Oct. 11, 1759; d. at Beaufort, S.C., May 23, 1825. American clergyman and writer, known for his biography of George Washington. In early life he studied medicine or surgery at Edinburgh, and later for the ministry in England, where he was one of the first two Americans to be ordained for the episcopacy in the U.S. The ceremony of ordination took place at London, on Sept. 12, 1784. He officiated successively in two Maryland parishes, and in 1791 he began to reprint religious books that he sold, with many others, for Mathew Carey of Philadelphia throughout the southern littoral from New Jersey to Georgia. This vocation suited both his temperament and a need for cash to support his increasing family, for he had married Frances Ewell on July 2, 1795. The couple established their home near Dumfries, Va., and his pen dashed off tracts, sentimental, humorous, or hortatory, on religion, politics, marriage, and biography. His longer diatribes against murder, gambling, drunkenness, dueling, and cruelty to husbands had a wide sale in his pilgrimages. He is chiefly known for his Life of Washington (1800), which reached over 80 editions, was of immense popularity, and was printed as late as 1932. Among many entertaining tales which it includes, the hatchet and cherry tree story is supposed to have originated in the 1806 edition. His later biographies (of Francis Marion, Benjamin Franklin, and William Penn) never attained wide sales. His talents, enthusiasms, and idiosyncrasies make him a unique character in American annals.

Wehner (væ'nér), Joseph Magnus. b. at Bernbach, Germany, Nov. 14, 1891—. German writer, known chiefly for his war novel Sieben vor Verdun (1930). Its sequel was Stadt und Festung Belgrad (1936). The strong feeling of German nationalism which marks these works is found also in A. L. Schlager (1934), Hindenburg (1935), and Das unsterbliche Reich (1933). Some variation from this phase is offered by his earlier works: the Roman Catholic narrative in verse Der Weiler Gottes (1921); the "fantastic stories" in Die mächtigste Frau (1923); and the novel Die Hochzeitsküh (1925). A trip to Greece produced Das Land ohne Schatten (1929).

Wergeland (ver'gél.län), Henrik Arnold Thaulow. [Pseudonym, Sifil Sifadda.] b. at Kristiansand, Norway, June 17, 1808; d. at Christiania (now Oslo), July 12, 1845. Norwegian poet. His first productions were a series of satirical farces, among them Ah! Om Snag og Behag kan man ikke disputere (There Is No Disputing fat, fâte, fâr, âsk, fâre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pîne; not, nôte, môve, nôr; up, lûte, pûll; ʒh, then; d, d or j; s, s or sh; t, t or ch;

about Taste) and Papegöjen (The Parrot), all published under the pseudonym Sifil Siffada. In 1828 appeared the tragedy Sinclair's Dörl (Sinclair's Death). In 1829 was published a volume of lyrics, many of them enthusiastically patriotic in character, which were taken up as songs by the people; and at this time his fame as a poet really begins. In 1830 appeared the long dramatic poem Stobelsen, Mennesket og Messias (The Creation, Man and Messiah). Subsequent works were the drama Optium (1831) and the poem Spindel (1833). In the meantime the poet Welhaven had made in a pamphlet, in 1832, a personal attack upon him for his sins of poetical commission, and in 1834, in the poem Narvays Twilight, had censured the misplaced zeal of the ultranational faction which Wergeland represented. At the production of his drama Campbellerne (The Campbells) the feud came to an open outbreak in the theater. Subsequently his fortunes steadily declined. He was deprived by the king of an official position, and then became involved in a lawsuit which took the greater part of his property. Some of his best work, however, was done after this time. Particularly to be mentioned are Jan van Huysums Blomsterstykke (Jan van Huysum's Flower-piece), a series of lyrics; the poem Svalen (The Swallow); the idylls Joden (The Jew) and Jøvidnen (The Jewess); and finally his last and greatest poem, Den engelske Løds (The English Pilot). His collected works were published at Christiania (1852-59) in nine volumes.

He became (1775) instructor in the Mining Academy at Freiberg. He was the propounder of the "Neptunian theory," which regarded as of aqueous origin various formations now considered to be volcanic, and which aroused much discussion. His works include Über die äussern Kennzeichen der Fossilien (1774), Kurze Klassifikation und Beschreibung der Gergirgarten (1787), Neue Theorie über die Entstehung der Gänge (1791), and others.

Werner, Alfred. b. at Mulhouse, in Alsace, 1866; d. at Zurich, Switzerland, 1919. Swiss chemist, winner (1913) of the Nobel prize in chemistry. His coordination theory of complexes (1893 et seq.) is one of the major bases of inorganic chemistry. In it the fixed valency view of Kekulé and others (largely satisfactory for organic chemistry) was replaced by a theory of variable residual valency with a maximum coordination number. Moreover, most complexes were experimentally shown to have an octahedral enantiomorphism, both mononuclear and polynuclear (1911 et seq.).

Werner, Anton Alexander von. b. at Frankfurt on the Main, Germany, May 9, 1843; d. at Berlin, Jan. 4, 1915. German painter, director (1875 et seq.) of the Academy of Fine Arts at Berlin. A list of his better-known works

Wesley, John. b. at Epworth, Lincolnshire, England, June 28, 1703; d. at London, March 2, 1791. English clergyman, famous as the founder of Methodism. He was educated at Charterhouse School and at Christ Church, Oxford, became a fellow of Lincoln College in 1726, and was curate to his father (1727-29). In the latter year he settled at Oxford, where he became the leader of a band of young men conspicuous for their religious earnestness; they were somewhat derisively called "methodists" from the regularity and strict method of their lives and studies. He went to Georgia as a missionary in 1735, returning to England in 1738. At first he was allied with the Moravians, but soon abandoned all ecclesiastical traditions and established the Methodist Church. In 1739 he began open-air preaching. The first Methodist conference was held in 1744.

Wesley, Samuel. b. at Bristol, England, Feb. 24, 1766; d. at London, Oct. 11, 1837. English organist; son of Charles Wesley (1707-88). Organist (1824 et seq.) at Camden Chapel, he promoted the work of Bach in England. He composed sonatas, a trio, and waltzes.

After elementary instruction at Christiania (now Oslo), he went in 1761 to the Copenhagen University, where he studied the succeeding year. Subsequently he supported himself by teaching modern languages. In 1778 he was made translator to the Royal Theater. His one important literary work, written when he was 30 years old, is the tragedy Kjærlighed uden Strømper (Love without Stockings), a parody on the French tragedies then in vogue on the Danish stage, from which it effectually banished them. Two other dramas are of but little value. He wrote, besides, a few lyrics and humorous narratives in verse. His poems were published in a second edition at Copenhagen in 1878.

Wessely (ves'e.lē), Karl. b. at Berlin, April 6, 1874—, German ophthalmologist. He constructed (1908) a mercury manometer as a recording apparatus for intraocular pressure, and worked on intraocular tension and circulation.

fāt, fāte, fār, āsk, fāre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pine; not, nōte, mōve, nōr; up, lūte, pūll; ʔh, then; ǵ, d or j; ǵ, s or sh; ǵ, t or ch;

Wiltshire, and Dorsetshire. Wessex obtained the overlordship in Britain in the first part of the 9th century, was reduced in power by the Danes, and under Alfred's successors developed into the kingdom of England. It was an earldom in the 10th and 11th centuries, comprising the territory S of the Thames. After 1066, when William the Conqueror defeated the Saxons, the term "Wessex" largely disappeared from use until 1874, when Thomas Hardy revived it. In his novel Far from the Madding Crowd he applied this name vaguely to the territory once ruled by Alfred the Great. The popularity of Hardy's Wessex novels brought the word back into common use, even though it does not appear on the map of England.

West Coast Hotel v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937) (par'ish). U.S. Supreme Court decision upholding a Washington state minimum wage law for women and formally overruling the judicial position in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923). In delivering the majority opinion, Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes said: "The exploitation of a class of workers who are in an unequal position with respect to bargaining power, and are thus relatively defenseless against the denial of a living wage, is not only detrimental to their health and well-being, but casts a direct burden for their support upon the community. What these workers lose in wages the taxpayers are called upon to pay. . . . The community is not bound to provide what is in effect a subsidy for unconscionable employers. The community may direct its lawmaking power to correct the abuse which springs from their selfish disregard of the public interest."

[Sometimes shortened to Westralia.] Largest state of the Australian Commonwealth, occupying the entire W section, bounded by the Indian Ocean on the N, W, and S, and by South Australia and the Northern Territory on the E. The interior is largely a desert, and is to a great extent unexplored. The Kalgoorlie area is one of the richest gold-mining regions in the world and the mineral resources of the state were formerly its greatest source of wealth, but are now far surpassed by the value of agricultural and pastoral production, which is concentrated in the SW part of the state. Slightly less than one fifth of the entire Australian wheat crop is grown here, and roughly 10 percent of the wool clip is produced. Other farm produce includes oats, hay, dairy products, vegetables, and apples and other fruits. There is an active forest and lumbering industry based on good stands of hardwoods (jarri and karrah, varieties of eucalyptus). Manufacturing industries in the state are chiefly light industries serving the domestic market. The state is connected with the rest of Australia by a transcontinental railroad and highway, and by air lines. Perth is the single great city, and the commercial center of the state, served by its port of Fremantle, which is included in the urban area of Perth. The government is vested in a governor, legislative council (elected since 1893), and a legislative assembly. It is represented in the federal Parliament by six senators and five representatives. A convict settlement was established at King George Sound in 1825, and free settlements were founded (c1829) nearby. Capital, Perth; area, 975,920 sq. mi.; pop. 502,480 (1947), 581,456 (est. 1951).

West Indies (in'diz). Extensive archipelago SE of North America, extending from the Bahama Islands, E of Florida, SE to Trinidad, off the NE coast of Venezuela. The group is commonly subdivided into three island groupings: Bahama Islands, Greater Antilles (including the large islands of Cuba, Hispaniola, Puerto Rico, and Jamaica), and the Lesser Antilles, including all of the remaining smaller islands. Some portions of the West Indies are low and either flat or rolling, such as the Bahamas, the C part of Cuba, and a few of the smaller islands; most of the other islands are largely hilly or mountainous, and in the Lesser Antilles there are several active volcanoes. The highest elevation is Pico Trujillo (10,115 ft.), on the island of Hispaniola. The islands lie in the zone of northeast trade winds, generally, and conditions on the windward (N or E) sides of the high islands are much wetter than on the leeward (S or SW) sides. The lowland climate is everywhere tropical, with hot, humid summers, and winters which are only slightly cooler, though generally drier. Hurricanes, which occur chiefly in the months of August to November, are a feature of the climate. Sugar cane is the principal commercial crop of the West Indies, and their economy is basically agricultural; other important crops include subsistence food crops, fruits, tobacco, cacao, coffee, bananas, and cotton. Fisheries are important along the coasts. The major cities are principally important commercial port cities, and have an active commerce with the U.S. and Europe, which are the chief markets for the tropical products of the region. Manufacturing industries serving the domestic market have grown relatively rapidly in Cuba and Puerto Rico in recent years. The West Indies were discovered by Columbus in 1492; he believed that he had reached the "Indies" of the Orient; hence the name for the group. The Indian tribes of the region were largely exterminated by the Spaniards, and it was thus necessary to introduce Negro slaves from Africa to supply labor for the plantations. Though slavery is no longer in existence in the region, the Negro is the predominant ethnic strain in most of the islands, with the notable exception of Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the E portion of Hispaniola (Dominican Republic). Politically, the West Indies consist of three independent nations, Cuba, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic, and territorial possessions of Great Britain, the U.S., France, the Netherlands, and Venezuela. The common languages are: Spanish in Cuba, Dominican Republic, and Puerto Rico, French in Haiti, English in the Bahamas and Jamaica, and English, French, Dutch, Spanish, or various dialects on the smaller islands. Area, ab. 92,200 sq. mi.; pop. 16,340,000 (1950).

Westminster. Former city, now a metropolitan borough, in W and SW London, in the County of London, situated on the N bank of the river Thames. It is noted for Westminster Abbey, around which it grew up, and for the Houses of Parliament, Buckingham Palace, Saint James's Palace, Albert Hall, the National Galleries, and others. Westminster was the chief crossing place of the Thames before London Bridge was built; Westminster Abbey was built nearby. It was a center of wealth and culture from the early Middle Ages onward. The adjoining palace (now the Houses of Parliament) built by the Norman kings helped to make this the political heart of the country. Many of the government buildings are located here, especially in Whitehall and in Downing Street. Covent Garden, the principal market for imported fruit and vegetables, is here. Westminster may be considered to be part of the West End of London. Until 1878 Westminster was separated from the City of London by Temple Bar (an archway across Fleet Street). 98,895 (1951).

Westminster. City in N Maryland, county seat of Carroll County; residential community. 6,140 (1950).

Westminster, Statute of. Enactment (1931) by the British Parliament formally recognizing the fact set forth at the Imperial Conference of 1926, that Great Britain and the British dominions constitute a free association of autonomous states, the British Commonwealth of Na-fat, fâte, fâr, âsk, fâre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pine; not, nôte, môve, nôr; up, lûte, pûll; ʔh, then; ǵ, d or j; ǵ, s or sh; t, t or ch;

tions, each of equal status, none being subordinate to any other in domestic affairs or external policy, but all being united in allegiance to the British Crown. An act passed in 1865 had subordinated dominion to British legislation, but in practice this concept of the relations between the mother country and the dominions had lapsed into desuetude, and the more realistic view of those relations had been developed during the several imperial conferences which were held from 1887 on. By 1931 it had become inconceivable that the British government would ever try to coerce any self-governing dominion, and the Statute of Westminster merely recognized an existing situation. The case of Canada was complicated by the fact that its fundamental law or constitution was the North America Act, an enactment of the British Parliament; but this difficulty was met by a commitment that the said Parliament would make changes in that act at, and only at, the request of Canada.

Westminster, Statutes of. Laws promulgated (1275-90) through the English Parliament, meeting at Westminster, by King Edward I. The first of these statutes, dating from 1275, is in its 51 clauses virtually a complete national code of law. Some of its provisions arise from enactments of King Canute or even of Alfred the Great; others point toward future legal evolution. Justice is decreed for all, for the poor as well as for the wealthy; elections are to be free and uncoerced; and provisions of Magna Charta concerning feudal rights and practices are confirmed or amended. The second of these statutes, ratified by Parliament at the king's behest in 1285, is especially concerned with land tenure, the really important matter in that epoch, and includes the noted clause De donis conditionalibus, which firmly fixed the custom of entail in English law. The third of these statutes, known to lawyers and legislators as Quia Emptores (1290), curbed the subinfeudation of land by declaring that in cases of alienation a new holder should be considered to hold directly from the prime lord of the land, rather than from any subordinate holder.

Westminster Abbey. Church in Westminster, London, founded on the site of an earlier church by Edward the Confessor, and rebuilt in the 13th century by Henry III and Edward I. The highly ornate chapel of Henry VII, at the east end, was added by that king in the early 16th century. The dimensions, including the chapel, are 513 by 75 ft.; length of transepts, 200 ft.; height of vaulting, 102 ft. The square west towers were designed by Sir Christopher Wren. The north transept façade has three portals, an arcade, and a large wheel window. Henry VII's chapel has nave and aisles, and five radiating chapels in the chevet; it is a notable example of florid Perpendicular style, especially remarkable for the fan tracery and pendants of its ceiling. Its rich stalls are appropriated to the knights and squires of the Bath; over each are suspended a sword and a banner. The abbey is world-famous as the chief burial place of Great Britain's distinguished men. The south transept constitutes the famous Poets' Corner; it contains memorials to a large number of the names honored in English literature. The choir chapels contain medieval and Renaissance monuments; in Henry VII's chapel is the monument of that king, in metal, by Torregiano. Several other kings and princes are buried in this chapel, and in that of Edward the Confessor, which occupies the extremity of the choir. The chapter house is octagonal, with central column. The cloisters also contain tombs.

Westminster Assembly. [Also, Assembly of Divines at Westminster.] Convocation summoned by the Long Parliament to advise "for the settling of the liturgy and the government of the Church of England." Most of its members were Presbyterians, and nearly all were Calvinists. It met July 1, 1643, and continued its sessions until Feb. 22, 1649. The chief fruits of its labors were the Directory of Public Worship, the Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, which were rejected in England but established in Scotland.

Westminster Bridge. Second oldest bridge over the Thames at London. The first bridge at this point was designed by Labeleye, a Swiss architect. The original plan contemplated a wooden structure, but it was changed to stone after the "great frost" of 1739. The piers were built of solid blocks of Portland stone, on caissons which were the largest that had been constructed up to that time. It was begun in 1739 and completed in 1750. It was 1,220 ft. long, 40 ft. wide, 58 ft. high, and the central span was 76 ft. wide; there were 15 arches. Between 1856 and 1862 it was replaced by the present stone and iron structure, consisting of seven iron arches on granite piers, built by Page; it is 1,160 ft. long and 85 ft. wide.

Westminster Hall. Structure at London, adjoining the Houses of Parliament on the west, forming part of the ancient palace of Westminster. It was begun by William Rufus, burned at the end of the 13th century, and restored by Edward II and Richard II. It has a magnificent framed hammer-beam roof (reinforced by steel after World War I) in a single span 68 ft. wide; the length is 290 ft. and the height 92 ft. Here sat some of the first English Parliaments; here, until George IV, the coronation festivities were held; and here Charles I. was condemned, and Cromwell saluted as Lord Protector. The hall now serves as a vestibule to the Houses of Parliament. Below it on the east is the crypt of Saint Stephen, or Church of Saint Mary Undercroft, a vaulted Gothic chapel, in architecture and decoration somewhat resembling the lower chapel of the Sainte Chapelle at Paris; the rich cloisters were built by Henry VIII. The roof of the hall was slightly damaged during enemy air action in World War II.

Westminster Palace. Former royal residence in Westminster, London. A palace is supposed to have existed at Westminster in the reign of Canute (1017-35). Its importance, however, begins with Edward the Confessor (1042-66). Various additions were made by his successors until Henry III (1216-72), in whose reign work was constantly in progress. His palace was richly decorated with pictures in oil (according to Horace Walpole, the first recorded use of that medium). It was repeatedly visited by fire, and in 1512 (reign of Henry VIII) all the living apartments were destroyed. It was then abandoned by royalty, and not used again until July 18, 1821, when George IV spent the night before his coronation there. The entire palace, except Westminster Hall, was burned in 1834.

Westminster School. Preparatory school at Westminster, London. It was established in Westminster Abbey by Henry VIII, and was reestablished by Elizabeth.

Westmorland (west'mōr.lənd). County in NW England. It is bounded on the N by Cumberland, on the E by Durham and Yorkshire, on the S by Yorkshire and Lancashire, and on the W by Cumberland and the detached portion of Lancashire. The surface is largely mountainous in the NW and NE. The county is drained by numerous streams, chief among which are the rivers Eden, Lune, Lowther, and Kent. Morecambe Bay and the estuary of the river Kent form an indentation on the SW. Westmorland ranks low in crop productivity, with only about half of the area under cultivation, mostly in oats. Farmsteads are small. The county includes part of the Lake District, with Windermere, Ullswater, Gasmere, and Hawes Water in it or on its borders. Various minerals are found, among them coal, lead, graphite, barytes, and iron. The principal town is Kendal, long famous for "Kendal cottons" (made from local wool); Appleby is the official county seat; area, ab. 789 sq. mi.; pop. 67,383 (1951).

West Virginia (vēr.jin'ya). [Called the "Panhandle State."] State of the E and C United States, bounded by Ohio (separated by the Ohio River) on the NW, Pennsylvania and Maryland (separated from Maryland in great part by the Potomac River) on the N, Virginia on the E and S, and Kentucky (separated by the Big Sandy River) on the W.

Population, Area, and Political Divisions. West Virginia is divided for administrative purposes into 55 counties. The state sends six representatives to Congress, and has eight electoral votes. Leading cities are Charleston, Huntington, and Wheeling. Capital, Charleston; area, 24,090 sq. mi. (24,181 sq. mi., including water); pop. 2,005,552 (1950), an increase of 5.4 percent over the 1940 figure. The state ranks 40th in area, and 29th (on the basis of the 1950 census) in population.

Terrain and Climate. The state has an extraordinarily irregular outline, the "Panhandle" in the N stretching along the Ohio River between Ohio and Pennsylvania. The E part is mountainous, having various ranges of the Appalachian system. The surface of the state in general is hilly. Spruce Knob (4,860 ft.), in the W central region, is the highest point in the state. In addition to the Ohio and its tributaries (the Monongahela, the Little Kanawha, the Kanawha, the Guyandot, and the Big Sandy) the state's rivers include the Potomac, which forms part of the N boundary. The climate is irregular varying from extremes of heat and cold in the mountains to mild temperatures along the Ohio and Kanawha rivers; the state has abundant rain.

Industry, Agriculture, and Trade. Mining is an important industry, West Virginia ranking as a leading coal-producing state; it also has abundant supplies of natural gas, petroleum, rock salt, and limestone. The production of iron and steel, glass products, and wood products are among the important industries. A large chemical industry is based on the salt brines of the Kanawha valley. Petroleum refining is also important. Wheeling and Charleston are both important industrial areas. Agriculture is a profitable occupation, particularly in the W, while the E part is well adapted to grazing. Corn, hay, wheat, oats, potatoes, tobacco, and apples are outstanding products; many other fruits are grown also. Cattle and poultry raising is extensive, and dairy products and eggs are among the important products of the state. Annual income in the state from agriculture ranges as high as 196 million dollars; from natural resources as high as 1,112,000,000 dollars; from manufacturing, as high as 1,408,000,000 dollars.

History. Until the Civil War the state was a part of Virginia. In 1863 it became a separate state, consisting of the W counties of Virginia, those counties having opposed secession and having organized at a convention held at Wheeling. A constitution was adopted (1862), and on June 20, 1863, the state was admitted to the Union (as the 35th state) under the name of West Virginia.

Culture. The state's rural population is greater than its urban population (ab. 35 percent urban in the 1950 census). The percentage of foreign-born inhabitants is small. White Sulphur Springs is a well-known mineral-spring resort, the site of the summer White House for a number of U.S. presidents, also the place of internment for 1,100 German, Japanese, and Italian diplomats at the outbreak of World War II. Harpers Ferry was the site of John Brown's raid in 1859. The state's institutions of higher learning include the state-supported West Virginia University at Morgantown, six state colleges, and two Negro colleges. The state motto is Montani Semper Liberi, meaning "Mountaineers [are] Always Free Men." The state flower is the rhododendron.

Weyden (wī'dēn), Roger (or Rogier) van der. [Also known as Roger de la Pasture.] b. at Tournai, Belgium, c1400; d. 1464. Painter of the Flemish school. He is thought to have been a goldsmith before turning to painting; it was formerly accepted, on the word of Vasari and others, that he studied under Jan van Eyck, but this is now very much doubted, and it is supposed rather that he was apprenticed to his fellow townsman Robert Campin before he was admitted as a member of the Guild of Saint Luke in 1432. When he moved to Brussels in 1435 his competence was sufficiently established for him to be appointed painter to the municipality. He is known to have embellished the town hall of Brussels with four compositions, namely The Emperor Trajan Punishing a Murderer, Saint Gregory at Prayer, Herkenbald Beheading His Own Son, Guilty of Violating a Maiden, and Miraculous Communion; but these have perished. In 1449 he visited Rome, Florence, Milan, and other Italian cities, lingering especially at Ferrara; he was much honored by Italian artists, and executed works for Italian patrons. His entire career was prosperous, marked by many commissions from churches, public bodies, and individual patrons. Roger van der Weyden has been called the only mystic among the religious painters of the Flemish school. His religious emotion was seconded by a strong sense of drama; in contrast with the serene, somewhat static beauty observed in the works of the Van Eycks, his pictures are alive with grief and tragedy, seen in bowed figures, agonized faces marked by tears, clenched hands or arms outstretched in appeal to heaven, all drawn together in compositions of tortuous and broken lines. In these characteristics of his art some influence of his Italian journey can be seen; in turn he influenced Italian painters and still more the German artists of the Cologne and Swabian schools, and somewhat paradoxically prepared the way for the later Flemish school which dropped religious subjects and turned to the celebration of frankly human passions. Roger van der Weyden's masterpiece is by general consent his Descent from the Cross, now in the Escorial; there are numerous authenticated examples of his work, together with disputed ascriptions, in the museums of Brussels and Antwerp, in the Vienna Gallery, in the Hermitage at Leningrad, and elsewhere. His Last Judgment is in the hospital at Beaune in Burgundy. The Metropolitan Museum of Art at New York possesses an impressive and typical Van der Weyden, Christ Appearing to His Mother, which was originally one wing of a triptych, the other two panels of which are in the cathedral of Granada, Spain.

He came to America as professor (1924-36) of philosophy at Harvard. Whitehead's philosophy, stemming from a base in mathematics, is idealistic; knowledge of the absolute in God is the aim of his thought. Author of A Treatise on Universal Algebra (1898), The Principles of Natural Knowledge (1919), Science and the Modern World (1925), Process and Reality, an Essay in Cosmology (1929), Adventures of Ideas (1933), Nature and Life (1934), and Religion in the Making (1926). He collaborated with Bertrand Russell on the monumental Principia Mathematica (3 vols., 1910-13).

Whitehead, Charles. b. at London, 1804; d. at Melbourne, Australia, 1862. English poet and writer. He published The Solitary (1831) and Autobiography of Jack Ketch (1834). The P.kewick Papers were written by Charles Dickens at his suggestion. In 1857 he went to Melbourne.

Whitehead, George. b. at Sun Bigs, Westmorland, England, c1636; d. March 8, 1723. English itinerant preacher and public disputant, one of the most energetic workers in the foundation of the Society of Friends and in the establishment of religious freedom. Whitehead, born of a Presbyterian family, was converted (c1650) and became (1654) an itinerant preacher. Between then and 1657 he was repeatedly arrested, tried, and imprisoned. In his frequent disputations with other clergymen, he developed and became known for oratory and literary skill. An act (1661) for the suppression of the Quakers turned all their meetings into the street, and between 1661 and 1672 Whitehead spent most of his time in prison. Meanwhile he succeeded in obtaining an audience with Charles II, during which he explained the Quakers' conscientious objection to swearing, and therefore his reasons for being unable to take the oath of allegiance. Under William and Mary, during the proceedings concerning the Toleration Bill, Whitehead presented his creed to the Commons committee and obtained an audience with William shortly after the bill was passed. Through the efforts of Sir Francis Winington, an Affirmation Act was passed (1696) removing the Quakers' disabilities. Whitehead's voluminous works are all controversial, written to defend or explain the position of Quakers on civil and religious liberty.

Whitehead, John Boswell. b. at Norfolk, Va., Aug. 18, 1872—. American electrical engineer. He was professor (1910-42) and director (1938-42) of the school of engineering at Johns Hopkins. He is known for his researches in the magnetic effect of electric displacement, measurement of high alternating voltage, and similar fields. His books include Electric Operation of Steam Railways (1909), Dielectric Theory and Insulation (1927), Impregnated Paper Insulation (1935), and Electricity and Magnetism (1939).

Whitehead, Robert. b. at Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, England, Jan. 3, 1823; d. at Shrivensham, Berkshire, England, Nov. 14, 1905. English inventor and manufacturer, best known for his invention (1866) of the Whitehead underwater torpedo and the "servo-motor" (1876) by which he improved the steering mechanism.

Whitehead, William. b. at Cambridge, England, 1715; d. at London, April 14, 1785. English poet, the successor of Colley Cibber as poet laureate. He was educated at Winchester and Cambridge (Clare Hall). In 1742 he became a fellow of Clare, and in 1757 poet laureate. He wrote the tragedies A Roman Father (1750) and Creusa (1754), the comedy A School for Lovers (1762), and others.

Whitehorse (hwit'hōrs). City in the S part of the Yukon Territory, Canada, connected by rail with Skagway in Alaska and by the Alaska Highway with Edmonton and with Alaska. It is situated at the head of navigation on the Yukon-Lewes river system. In recent years a large airport was built nearby, which, with the completion of the Alaska Highway, has contributed to the growth of the town (American troops and construction crews swelled the population during World War II to ab. 8,000). 2,594 (1951).

White Horse, Vale of the. [Also, White Horse Vale.] Valley in Berkshire, England, W of Abingdon, so called from the White Horse of Uffington.

White Horse of Uffington (uff'ing-ton). Huge figure of a horse (374 ft. long) made by cutting away the turf on an escarpment of the Chalk Downs near Wantage, Berkshire, England, and near Uffington castle. Traditionally it is said to commemorate the battle of Ashdown (871) when Alfred the Great defeated the Danes. Actually it is now believed to be much more ancient, possibly having been cut by Celtic settlers from Gaul, who fled from Roman rule. The horse was a religious symbol of the Belgic Gauls.

White House. Locality in Virginia, on the Pamunkey River E of Richmond: a prominent point in the movements against Richmond in the Civil War.

White House, the. Official residence of the presidents of the U.S. at Washington, D.C. In 1792 architects were invited to submit designs for what was intended to be called the President's Palace. The winning design, by the Irish-born James Hoban, was strongly reminiscent of Leinster House at Dublin. In that same year the cornerstone of this oldest official structure in the national capital was laid by President Washington, and it was completed, and first occupied by President John Adams, in 1800. Burned by the British in 1814, it was reconstructed under Hoban's supervision (1815-18), and at that time the walls of Virginia sandstone were painted white. Thereafter, though it was officially known as the Executive Mansion, its popular designation was the White House, and this name was eventually made official by President Theodore Roosevelt. Neither parsimoniously simple nor pretentiously ornate, neither large enough to suggest imitation of regal palaces nor too small to assert its importance, the White House has dignity and an engaging beauty. Situated on the S side of Pennsylvania Avenue, facing Jackson Square and 16th Street, and surrounded by 18 acres of lawns and gardens embellished by trees and fountains, the mansion's length (E-W) is 170 ft. and its depth 86 ft. Originally it was, and still appears to be, two stories high, but excavation of the basement and improvement of the attic in 1934 made it in fact a four-story building. The north front is broken by a porte-cochère in the form of a portico upheld by Ionic columns extending to the roof pediment; a rounded bay and portico, looking over sloping lawns and gardens to the Washington Monument and the Tidal Basin, add grace to the south façade. The public is admitted during specified hours to a portion of the first floor; here are the Green Room; the Blue Room, where ambassadors and ministers of foreign countries are received and diplomatic functions held; the State Dining Room, where as many as 54 persons can sit at table; and, somewhat elevated and reached by a flight of stairs, the 80-foot long, 40-foot wide East Room, used for public receptions. The private apartments of the president and his family, with guest rooms, are situated on the upper floors. By 1902 the White House had become quite inadequate for the volume of executive business transacted by the president and his aides, and on the initiative of President Theodore Roosevelt the Executive Offices were added in the form of wings extending to the east and the west, architecturally congruous, and at a depressed level, so that they do not too much detract from the appearance of the main structure. In 1942 an air-raid shelter was constructed under the east wing of the Executive Offices. In 1948, at the instance of President Truman, a second-story porch was added to the bay at the south. In 1949 it was found that the effects of age had so weakened some of the floors and other structural features of the White House as to constitute an actual danger, and President Truman and his family removed to Blair House while the White House underwent extensive repairs, which were completed in 1952.

"White Indians" (in'di.anz). See Cuna.

Whiteing (hw'ing), Richard. b. at London, July 27, 1840; d. June 29, 1928. English author and journalist. He was writer and correspondent for a number of leading English newspapers. White-Jacket; or, The World in a Man-of-War. Serialautobiographical novel by Herman Melville, published in 1850.

White Lady. In German folklore, a spectral woman clothed in white, a benevolent revenant who appears to certain people to warn or reward them. She is usually associated with some noble family, and is commonly interpreted as an ancestress. In some parts of Germany she is identified with Berchta. The White Lady of the Hohenzollerns appeared periodically to foretell the death of some member of the family or to announce some event of importance to Germany. The Hapsburg family of Austria had a similar ancestral lady who foretold disaster.

Whitelocke (hwit'lok), Bulstrode. b. at London, Aug. 6, 1605; d. at Clifton, Wiltshire, England, 1675. English statesman. In 1626 he was a member of Parliament for Stafford, and he sat in the Long Parliament (1640 et seq.) for Great Marlow. He took a prominent part in the proceedings against Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, but he succeeded in maintaining a moderate or neutral position through the English Civil War, Commonwealth, and Restoration. In 1645 he was appointed a commissioner to treat with the king at Uxbridge. He committed himself neither to the Independents nor to the Presbyterians, and had nothing to do with the king's trial and execution. In 1653 he was ambassador to Sweden, and in 1659 was commissioner of the great seal. He was pardoned at the Restoration. He wrote Memorials of English Affairs (1682).

White Maid, The. English title of Dame Blanche, La. Whiteman (hwit'man), Paul. b. at Denver, Colo., March 28, 1891—u. American director of popular music. He conducted throughout the U.S. and toured Europe with his band. He introduced Ferde Grofé's Grand Canyon Suite, George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, and Deems Taylor's Circus Days. Whiteman, styled the "King of Jazz," attempted to blend the jazz idiom with symphonic arrangement and to bring jazz to the concert-hall level, but, while his style became popular, it was frowned upon by purists as destructive of the basic jazz.

In 1836 he went to Oregon for the American Board as missionary physician. Convinced of the value of the country, he returned (1842-43) to Washington, and by his representations practically succeeded in securing Oregon for the U.S. To prove its accessibility to settlers, he led back in the same year a large train of wagons to the valley of the Columbia. He was murdered by Indians.

Whitman, Sarah Helen. [Maiden name, Power.] b. at Providence, R.I., Jan. 19, 1803; d. there, June 27, 1878. American poet and critic. A widow, she became engaged (1848) to Edgar Allan Poe, and, though the engagement was broken off, defended him in her volume Edgar A. Poe and His Critics (1860). She also wrote Hours of Life, and Other Poems (1853), and various poems in collaboration with her sister, Anna M. Power.

Whitman, Walt. [Full prename, Walter; called the "Good Gray Poet."] b. at West Hills, Huntington township, Long Island, N.Y., May 31, 1819; d. at Camden, N.J., March 26, 1892. American poet. After brief schooling at Brooklyn, he worked as office boy, printer, journalist, schoolteacher, and carpenter. He edited country newspapers on Long Island, contributed to prominent New York journals (including the Democratic Review), and wrote a sentimental temperance novel, Franklin Evans. From 1846 to 1848 he was editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, but was discharged because of his support of the Free-Soil Party. For three months in the spring of 1848 he worked on the New Orleans Crescent, then returned to Brooklyn, where he edited a Free-Soil paper, the Freeman, for a year. During the period 1851-54 he worked with his father as carpenter, meanwhile composing the poems which he published on July 4, 1855, as Leaves of Grass, a thin quarto of 94 pages printed at his own expense. The book did not sell, but Ralph Waldo Emerson praised it, and the poet was encouraged to publish (1856) a revised and expanded edition of 384 pages which attracted some attention, mostly violent abuse. During the years 1857-59 Whitman edited the Brooklyn Times. In this period just before the outbreak of the Civil War, he frequented Pfaff's restaurant, a Bohemian rendezvous on Broadway. The third edition of Leaves of Grass was published in 1860 by the well-known Boston firm of Thayer and Eldridge, which went into bankruptcy the following year. In December, 1862, Whitman went to the battle front in Virginia to find his wounded brother, George, an officer in the Union army, and stayed on at Washington as a volunteer worker in army hospitals, supporting himself by war correspondence and clerical assistance. It was at this time he became a friend of William Douglas O'Connor and John Burroughs. He was appointed in January, 1865, to a clerkship in the Indian Bureau of the Department of the Interior, but was discharged on June 30 by Secretary James Harlan in a general reduction of the pay roll; however, in a pamphlet, The Good Gray Poet (1866), O'Connor accused Secretary Harlan of discriminating against the author of the sex poems in Leaves of Grass (1860 edition). Through O'Connor's help Whitman was appointed to a clerkship in the office of the attorney general, where he remained until he was stricken with paralysis early in 1873. Thenceforth he lived at Camden, N.J., first at the home of his brother, George, and later (1884-92) in his own modest house on Mickle Street. While at Washington he published Drum-Taps (1865) and a Sequel (1866), which contained his great elegy on Lincoln, "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd." He also published during this period the fourth (1867) and fifth (1871) editions of Leaves of Grass, and his most sustained piece of prose, Democratic Vistas (1871).

Recognition and Later Years. Up to this time he had received little recognition in the U.S., but in 1867 William Rossetti reviewed Leaves of Grass in England and the following year edited a volume of selections. The ensuing recognition and subscriptions for his books encouraged the poet during this period of illness and poverty. He was also assisted in many ways by a group of loyal friends at Camden and Philadelphia, among them Horace Traubel, who became his Boswell and published three volumes (a fourth volume remains in manuscript) of the poet's old-age conversation and correspondence under the title With Walt Whitman in Camden (1906, 1908, 1914). By 1878 Whitman's health had improved and he began to travel, going by rail the following year as far west as Denver. In 1881 a second Boston publisher, Osgood, issued a revised and reorganized Leaves of Grass which became the basis of all future editions. After protests from the Society for the Suppression of Vice, Osgood stopped distribution and the plates were taken over by Rees Welsh, at Philadelphia, and later by David McKay. In 1882 also appeared Specimen Days and Collect, composed of diary notes, war memoranda, and literary essays, later collected, with Democratic Vistas, in Prose Works (1888). Despite grave illness the poet published November Boughs (1888) and the final edition of Leaves of Grass (1891), known as the "deathbed edition." Whitman is buried in Harleigh Cemetery, Camden, in a tomb designed and constructed under his own supervision. His poems have been translated into many languages.

Whitmer (hwit'mér), David. b. near Harrisburg, Pa., Jan. 7, 1805; d. Jan. 25, 1888. American Mormon leader. Hearing (1828) the story of Joseph Smith's claim to having discovered the "Golden Plates" bearing divine revelation, he took Smith and Oliver Cowdery into the Whitmer household, where the translation of the Book of Mormon was brought to completion. Smith baptized him into the Mormon faith and he was one of the "Three Witnesses" permitted to inspect the "Golden Plates" and bear testimony to their material existence and supernatural derivation. With Smith, he went to Ohio and Missouri; he served (1834 et seq.) as president of the "High Council of Zion"; and after disagreement with Smith was excommunicated (1838) from the Mormon Church. He settled (1838) at Richmond, Mo., where in 1847 and 1867 he became leader of the "Church of Christ," initiated a journal, and began working among other Mormons, winning some 150 members to his fold at the time of his death.

Author also of several volumes of poems, including Mother Goose for Grown Folks (1860), Pansies (1872), Holy-Tides (1886), Daffodils (1887), and White Memories (1893).

Whitney, Eli. b. at Westborough, Mass., Dec. 8, 1765; d. at New Haven, Conn., Jan. 8, 1825. American inventor and manufacturer. He was graduated from Yale in 1792, and in the same year went to Georgia as a teacher, and there, while a guest at the plantation of Mrs. Nathaniel Greene and in answer to a request made by her, invented the cotton gin for separating the staple from the seed. His workshop was broken into and his machine stolen and others made before he could secure a patent. He subsequently made a fortune in the manufacture of firearms at Whitneyville, near New Haven; Whitney was among the first to suggest and to put into operation the industrial principle of interchangeable parts. Both the cotton gin, which permitted a tremendous expansion of cotton planting, and the principle of parts standardization were of great importance in American economic history.

Whitney, Gertrude Vanderbilt. b. at New York, April 19, 1877; d. there, April 18, 1942. American sculptor; daughter of Cornelius Vanderbilt and wife of Harry Payne Whitney. She conceived and financed the Whitney Museum of American Art, which was opened in 1931. It was first on the site of the Whitney Studio Club, which she had founded to exhibit the work of unknown artists. Among her principal works are the Titanic memorial statue and the Aztec fountain in the Pan American building, Washington, D.C., the fountain at McGill University, Montreal, and various equestrian statues.

Whitney, Harry Payne. b. at New York, April 29, 1872; d. Oct. 26, 1930. American capitalist and sportsman; son of William Collins Whitney. Associated (1902 et seq.) with Guggenheim mining interests, banks, and railroads, he inherited (1904) 24 million dollars from his father. He was organizer and captain of the U.S. polo team which won (1909) and twice defended (1911, 1913) the International Cup against England; he established one of the largest racing stables in the U.S. He financed the expedition (1921-22) sent by the American Museum of Natural History to collect Polynesian birds.

Whitney, Josiah Dwight. b. at Northampton, Mass., Nov. 23, 1819; d. at Lake Sunapee, N.H., Aug. 18, 1896. American geologist; brother of William Dwight Whitney. He was connected as geologist with the New Hampshire survey (1840-42), studied and traveled in Europe (1842-47), was assistant geologist of the U.S. survey of the Lake Superior region (1847-49), and became state chemist of Iowa and professor at Iowa State University in 1855. He was connected with the state surveys of Wisconsin and Illinois (1858-60), was state geologist of California (1860-74), and became professor of geology at Harvard in 1865. Mount Whitney, in California, was named for him. With J. W. Foster he published reports on the Lake Superior survey (1849 and 1850-51), and with James Hall reports on the geological survey of Iowa (1858-59) and on that of Wisconsin (1862). He also wrote The Metallic Wealth of the United States (1854), Geological Survey of California (1864-70), The Yosemite Guide-Book (1869), Barometric Hypsometry (1874), a volume on the botany of California (1877), Names and Places (1888), and other works.

Whitney, Mary Watson. b. at Waltham, Mass., Sept. 11, 1847; d. Jan. 21, 1920. American astronomer and teacher. She served (1888-1910) as professor of astronomy and director of the observatory at Vassar. She helped prepare a notable series of positions of comets and asteroids and studies of variable stars.

Whitney, Mount. Peak of the Sierra Nevada on the border of Inyo and Tulare counties, California: the highest peak in the U.S. It was named for Josiah Dwight Whitney. Elevation, 14,495 ft.

Whittaker, James. b. at Oldham, England, Feb. 28, 1751; d. at Enfield, Conn., July 20, 1787. Spiritual head of the Shaker church after the death of "Mother" Ann Lee. Known as "Father James," this disciple of the English prophetess was probably the originator of the communistic principles on which the Shaker society was based.

Whittier (hwit'ī.ər). City in S California, on Los Angeles County: suburban residential community and trade center for a fruit and truck farming area. It is the seat of Whittier College. 23,820 (1950).

Whittier, John Greenleaf. [Called the "Quaker Poet."] b. near Haverhill, Mass., Dec. 17, 1809; d. at Hampton Falls, N.H., Sept. 7, 1892. American poet, abolitionist, and journalist. He was born of Quaker stock and reared on a rugged New England farm. The youthful Whittier enjoyed few advantages, his education being restricted to such schooling as the district afforded and two terms in the Haverhill Academy. The discovery by William Lloyd Garrison of the youth's literary bent and knack of easy rhyming led to his first employment and a public career which, begun at the age of 19, was concerned for 30 years with newspaper editorship and active participation in the antislavery struggle. He edited successively the American Manufacturer at Boston (1829), the Essex Gazette at Haverhill (1830 and again in 1836), the New England Weekly Review at Hartford (1830–31), the Pennsylvania Freeman at Philadelphia (1838–40), the Middlesex Standard at Lowell (1844–45), and the National Era at Washington (1847–50), besides contributing to many other periodicals. In 1833 he espoused the cause of abolition, to become in the years that followed a power in its politics and its recognized laureate. He was a delegate to the Anti-Slavery Convention in Philadelphia in 1835 and a signer of its declaration. The same year he served a term in the Massachusetts legislature. With the triumph of abolition, Whittier devoted the remaining years of his long life chiefly to poetry, contributing mostly to the New York Independent and the Atlantic Monthly. Ill health, which dogged him all his life, compelled withdrawal from public affairs. Whittier never married. After 1836 he made his home at Amesbury, Mass., and in his later years lived also at Danvers. The popularity of his poetry made him prosperous.

Written Works. Whittier's literary output, both prose and verse, was enormous, most of it contributed to the newspapers and periodicals with which he was associated, and much of it uncollected. His more important publications are Legends of New England (1831), Justice and Expediency (1833), Poems (1838), Lays of My Home (1843), Voices of Freedom (1846), Margaret Smith's Journal (1849), Old Portraits and Modern Sketches (1850), Songs of Labor (1850), The Chapel of the Hermits (1853), Literary Recreations and Miscellanies (1854), The Panorama (1856), Home Ballads and Poems (1860), In War Time (1864), Snow-Bound (1866), The Tent on the Beach (1867), Among the Hills (1869), Miriam (1871), The Pennsylvania Pilgrim (1872), Hazel-Blossoms (1875), The Vision of Echar (1878), The King's Missive (1881), The Bay of Seven Islands (1883), Saint Gregory's Guest (1886), and At Sundown (1890). In 1888–89 his complete works, all that he thought worth preserving, were collected in seven volumes. Whittier's powers as a poet are best revealed in his antislavery polemics, idylls of New England life, ballads, and religious lyrics. Among his best-known poems are Snow-Bound, Skipper Ireson's Ride, Telling the Bees, Ichabod, Massachusetts to Virginia, Laud Deo, Barbara Frietche, The Barefoot Boy, Maud Muller, and The Eternal Goodness.

Place among American Poets. Ranked at the end of the 19th century among the foremost American poets, his name a household word among plain people, Whittier later declined in critical esteem. In the reappraisal that has overtaken America's popular poets of the 19th century, the "Quaker poet" has been relegated to a minor niche as the spokesman of an era that is past and of a New England that has vanished. Whittier himself modestly disclaimed any pretensions of his muse to greatness, preferring to be remembered as the champion of human rights. If his verses seldom penetrate the higher reaches of poetry, the fame of the best of them is secure for their homespun qualities of sincerity, earnestness, and simple faith. See Life and Letters, by S. T. Pickard (2 vols., 1894), and a definitive Bibliography, by T. F. Currier (1937).

Whittingham (hwit'ing.əm), Charles. b. at Caledon, Warwickshire, England, June 16, 1767; d. at Chiswick, Middlesex, England, Jan. 5, 1840. English printer, founder of the Chiswick Press. He issued at London for various booksellers editions of Boswell's Johnson, William Robertson's Charles V and History of America (1777), and Gray's Poems, and published the British Classics (1803), the British Theatre, and the British Poets (1805). He moved (1809) to Chiswick, where he began to manufacture paper pulp and where he founded (1810) the Chiswick Press, using the name for the first time on a volume published in 1811. He brought out finely printed and illustrated books, among them The Vicar of Wakefield (1815), another edition, in 100 volumes, of the British Poets (1822), and the Fables (1st series, 1829; 2nd series, 1833) of James Northcote. He is credited with being the first English printer to use India paper.

Whittington (hwit'ing.tən). Former civil parish in C England, in Derbyshire, ab. 9 mi. S of Sheffield, ab. 149 mi. N of London by rail.

Whittington, Richard. b. c1358; d. in March, 1423. Lord Mayor of London. He was a son of a Gloucestershire knight who died an outlaw in 1360. In 1393 he was an alderman and sheriff of London, and he was chosen mayor in 1397, 1406, 1419. In 1416 he was elected member of Parliament for London. A legend of c1300 depicts him as going up to London, to seek his fortune, and becoming a scullion to a merchant in whose house he received cruel treatment. He bought a cat for a penny and sent it "on a venture" over the sea. It was sold for a great sum in a rat-ridden country which had no cats, and Whittington's fortune was made. Eventually he married the merchant's daughter, and three times became Lord Mayor of London. How this story became associated with the historical Whittington is unknown. It was a popular and widespread tale all over Europe in the 13th century and was known as early as the 12th. W. A. Clouston cites Breton, Bohemian, Danish, French, German, Italian, Norwegian, Portuguese, and Russian versions of it. There was also a 13th-century Persian tale identical in plot for which scholars postulate a still unfound Indian (probably Buddhist) original.

Whittlesey (hwit'li.sī). [Also, Whittlesea.] Urban district and market town in E England, in the Isle of Ely, Cambridgeshire, ab. 5 mi. E of Peterborough, ab. 95 mi. N of London by rail. It is situated in a part of the Fens drained in 1851. Pop. 17,430 (1951).

Whittridg (hwit'ri.j), Worthington. b. May 22, 1820; d. Feb. 25, 1910. American landscape painter. He was elected president of the National Academy of Design in 1874.

Whitworth (hwit'wərth). Urban district in NW England, in Lancashire, ab. 194 mi. NW of London. 7,442 (1951).

Whitworth, Sir Joseph. b. at Stockport, England, Dec. 21, 1803; d. at Monte Carlo, Jan. 22, 1887. English inventor and manufacturer, noted especially for his breech-loading cannon and rifles. In 1840 he demonstrated that accuracy in planing metal was possible, and the following year suggested a uniform screw-thread standard (Whitworth thread). He developed a hexagonal-bore rifle whose accuracy was greater than the standard Enfield guns.

Whydah (hwid'a). English name of Ouldah.

Whymper (hwim'pər), Edward. b. at London, April 27, 1840; d. at Chamonix, France, Sept. 16, 1911. English book illustrator and alpinist. He toured the Alps (1860), making sketches, and climbed Mont Pelvoux in 1861. He almost lost his life in the descent after climbing (1865) the Matterhorn, the first time the peak was achieved.

He was the first to climb Mount Chimborazo in Ecuador (1889) and other Andean peaks. He visited Greenland, Ecuador, and Canada, collecting plants, making sketches, and studying the effects of atmospheric pressure on human beings, and invented a special tent for mountain climbers. He illustrated his own books which recount his experiences and observations, Scrambles in the Alps in the Years 1860-69 (1871), Travels Amongst the Great Andes of the Equator (1892), Chamonix and Mt. Blanc (1896), and Zermatt and the Matterhorn (1897).

Wickersham (wik'er.sham, -sham), George Woodward. b. at Pittsburgh, Pa., Sept. 19, 1858; d. Jan. 25, 1936. American lawyer, U.S. attorney general (1909-13) under Taft. He practiced law at Pittsburgh until 1882, and later at New York. As attorney general he was in charge of prosecuting many of the antitrust cases begun in the Theodore Roosevelt and Taft administrations. He headed (1929-31) a government commission investigating law enforcement and the entire situation of the breakdown of observance of federal laws so notorious during the latter days of prohibition; the committee and its reports, both popularly named for him, indicated that change in enforcement procedures was needed if the law of the land were to retain any respect. He headed (1932 et seq.) the International Arbitral Tribunal under the Young Plan treaties.

Wickersham Commission. [Official title, National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement.] Commission appointed by President Hoover in May, 1929, for the purpose of studying a variety of social problems. Headed by George Woodward Wickersham, the commission conducted inquiries in fields including federal prohibition, juvenile delinquency, the enforcement of criminal law, and political influence in the court system. Its findings were published in 14 separate reports in 1931.

Wickfield (wik'fild), Agnes. Daughter of Mr. Wickfield the solicitor, and second wife of David Copperfield, in Charles Dickens's novel of that name.

Wickham (wik'am), Anna. b. at Wimbledon, Surrey, England, 1844—. English poet. Among her volumes of poetry are The Contemplative Quarry (1920), The Man with a Hammer (1921), and The Little Old House (1922).

Wicklow (wik'lo). [Irish, Gill Mantán.] Maritime county of the Irish Republic, in Leinster province. It is bounded on the N by County Dublin, on the E by the Irish Sea, on the S by County Wexford, and on the W by Counties Carlow and Kildare. The surface is almost entirely hilly and mountainous, rising to an elevation of 3,039 ft. Minerals found are lead, copper, and pyrites, all of which are worked to some extent. The county was early famous for its gold and copper. Sheep and dairy cattle are raised, the sheep being pastured on the uplands. The E. coastal part is sometimes known as the "Garden of Ireland." Wicklow is the county seat; area, ab. 782 sq. mi.; pop. 62,500 (1951).

Wicklow. [Irish, Gill Mantán.] Urban district, market town, and seaport in the Irish Republic, in Leinster province, county seat of County Wicklow, situated at the mouth of the river Vartry, on St. George's Channel, ab. 27 mi. SE of Dublin. It was formerly an important seaport, but has lost that prominence due to the silting of the harbor. The ruins of Black Castle are here, 3,333 (1951).

Wickram (vik'räm), Jörg. b. probably at Colmar, in Alsace, early in the 16th century; d. before 1562. German prose writer, generally considered to have been the first German novelist. Some of his novels, such as Ritter Galmy (1539), are just old tales of knighthood in new dress, but feudalism disappears and the middle class emerges in such works as Goldfaden (1557) and Der Knabenspiegel (1554). He also wrote Shrovetide plays. His drama of the prodigal son (Der verlorne Sun, 1540) was very popular in his day, as was his collection of anecdotes, Das Rollwagenbüchlein (1555).

Wicksell (vik'sel), Knut. b. at Stockholm, Dec. 20, 1851; d. at Stocksund, near Stockholm, May 3, 1926. Swedish economist. He was professor (1900-16) at the University of Lund. Influenced by the views of Léon Walras and Böhm-Bawerk, he based his theory of interest upon the concept of marginal productivity. He made important contributions in the fields of money and credit, formulating social concepts of interest, taxation, and monetary structure which make him in some ways a forerunner of John Maynard Keynes. A neo-Malthusian, he held that birth control and emigration would lessen population pressures in many European countries.

Wiclif (wik'lif), John. See Wycliffe or Wyclif, John.

Widah (wē'dā). See Ouidah.

Widal (vē.däl), Fernand. [Full name, Georges Fernand Isidore Widal.] b. at Dellys, Algeria, March 9, 1862; d. at Paris, Jan. 14, 1929. French physician. He discovered (1896) bacterial agglutinins, investigated (1888), with A. Chantemesse, the possibilities of anti-typhoid inoculation (1888), described (1907) the acquired type of hemolytic jaundice, called Hayem-Widal's type, and also described (1914) the relationship between anaphylactic shock and asthma. He is best known for the so-called Widal's test, an agglutination test for typhoid fever using a living agglutinable culture of the typhoid bacillus as an antigen.

Widmerer (wid'ē.mēr), Margaret. b. at Doylestown, Pa., c1880—. American writer. She married (1919) Robert Haven Schaffer, from whom she was divorced. Her verse includes Factories (1915), Old Road to Paradise (1918), Ballads and Lyrics (1925), Road to Downberry (1931), and Hill Garden (1937). Author of The Rose-Garden Husband (1915), The Board Walk (1919), Graven Image (1923), Some Day I'll Find You (1940), Lovers Alibi (1941), Angela Comes Home (1942), Constancia Herself (1945), and other novels. Her volumes of short stories include Years of Love (1933) and Ladies Go Masked (1939).

Widener (wid'nēr), Harry Elkins. b. at Philadelphia, Jan. 3, 1885; d. aboard the S.S. Titanic, April 15, 1912. American rare-book collector; grandson of Peter Arrell Brown Widener. After his death his mother gave the Harry Elkins Widener Memorial Library (opened June 24, 1915) to Harvard.

Widener, Joseph Early. b. at Philadelphia, Aug. 19, 1872; d. there, Oct. 26, 1943. American businessman and turfman; son of Peter Arrell Brown Widener. He was a director of several companies, including the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Fidelity-Philadelphia Trust Company, was the chief owner of the Belmont Park and Hialeah Park race tracks and maintained stud farms near Lexington, Ky., and Chantilly, France, and in 1942 donated to the National Gallery of Art his extensive art collection including paintings by Raphael, Rembrandt, Titian, and Van Dyck.

Widener, Peter Arrell Brown. b. at Philadelphia, Nov. 13, 1834; d. Nov. 6, 1915. American financier and benefactor. Entering the meat business at Philadelphia, he later invested in street-railroad holdings at Philadelphia, New York, and Chicago, and developed interests in steel, shipping, tobacco, real estate, and other fields. He assembled an extensive and valuable collection of art objects, including Chinese porcelains, old furniture, paintings, and bronzes, which went to the city of Philadelphia after his death. He built (1906) the Widener Memorial Industrial Training School for Crippled Children, which he also endowed.

Widerspänstigen Zähmung (vē.dēr.shpen'stīgen tsā'ŋ-mung), Der. [English title, The Taming of the Shrew.] Opera in four acts by Hermann Götz, with a libretto by J. V. Widmann, first performed at Mannheim on Oct. 11, 1874. The opera is taken from Shakespeare's comedy.

Widforss (vē'd'fōrs), Gunnar Mauritz. b. at Stockholm, Oct. 21, 1879; d. in Arizona, in December, 1934. American painter known for his water colors of the national parks. His most famous work is The Three Patriarchs (National Museum, Washington, D.C.).

Widin (vē'dīn). See Vidin.

Widmann (vit'män), Josef Viktor. b. at Nennowitz, near Brno (Brünn), in Moravia, Feb. 20, 1842; d. at Bern, Switzerland, Nov. 6, 1911. Swiss writer and critic writing in German. He was for many years literary editor of the Bern newspaper Der Bund.

Widnes (wid'nēs). Municipal borough and manufacturing town in NW England, in Lancashire, situated on the river Mersey ab. 11 mi. SE of Liverpool, ab. 188 mi. NW of London by rail. Its industries include chemical, glass, and soap works, iron foundries, nonferrous metals refineries, and locomotive works. 48,795 (1951).

Widor (vē.dōr), Charles Marie Jean Albert. b. at Lyons, France, Feb. 22, 1845; d. at Paris, March 12, 1937. French organist and composer, organist (1870 et seq.) at Saint-Sulpice, Paris. In 1890 he became professor of the organ at the Paris Conservatory and in 1896 professor of counterpoint and fugue. His best-known works are ten symphonies for the organ and the ballet La Korrigane (1880).

Widow, The. Comedy by Thomas Middleton, composed c1616, printed in 1652, and then attributed to Ben Jonson, John Fletcher, and Middleton.

Widow Barnaby (bār'nā.bi). Novel by Frances Trollope, published in 1839.

Widow's Tears, The. Comedy by George Chapman, published in 1612.

Widsith (wid'sith). English poem of the 7th century, incorporating three metrical name-lists of the 6th century: one of kings, one of tribes, and one of heroes. These lists are the earliest surviving literary compositions in the English language. They give us some idea of the professional repertory of an English gleeman of the time, as many of the names listed stand for poems about the persons named. Unluckily only one such poem (Finnsburg) survives, and this only in fragmentary form. The author of Widsith is unknown. His poem deals with the life of an ideal gleeman, whose name (which means "one who wanders far and wide") gives name to the poem as well.

Widukind (vē'dō.kint). See Wittekind.

Wiechert (vē'chert), Ernst. b. at Kleinort (a forester's lodge), in East Prussia, May 18, 1887; d. at Zurich, Switzerland, Aug. 24, 1950. German novelist and teacher. His early forest environment finds its way into all his writings. He entitled the account of his early years Wälder und Menschen (1936). The hero of his first novel, Die Flucht (1916), like Wiechert, gives up teaching and takes to the woods. The same thing happens to a naval officer in Das einfache Leben (1939). The forest is the last recourse of the returning soldier in Die Majorin (1934; Eng. trans., The Baroness, 1936), considered by many to be psychologically his best work. So much scope is given to primitive nature in Die Magd des Jürgen Daskoel (1932) that the story is almost a myth. World War I and postwar conditions are dealt with in such novels as Der Wald (1922), Der Totenwolf (1924), and Jedermann (1931), and the stories Der Hirtenknecht (1935) and Der Todeskandidat (1934).

Wied (vēt), Wilhelm Friedrich Heinrich zu. German name of William of Wied.

Wiedenbrück (vē'den.brük). Town in W Germany, in the Land (state) of North Rhine-Westphalia, British Zone, formerly in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, situated on the Ems River ab. 20 mi. SW of Bielefeld; textile and furniture manufactures; stone and wood carving establishments. It is an old town, with churches of the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries. The Rathaus (town hall) dates from 1619. These and other buildings of interest to tourists were undamaged in World War II. 12,234 (1950).

Wieland (vē'lānt), Christoph Martin. b. near Biberach, Germany, Sept. 5, 1733; d. at Weimar, Germany, Jan. 20, 1813. German poet and novelist. His father was a pastor, and the poet's early works (Die Natur der Dinge, 1751; Anti-Ovid, 1752) show this didactic and religious influence. It was largely for this reason that J. J. Bodmer invited him to Zurich, where he continued in this vein with the Biblical epic Der gepährte Abraham (1753) and the poem Empfindungen des Christen (1755), directed at the frivolity of the Anacreontic poets. With his return to Biberach, where he was given a minor position in the government, his attitude changed completely; he associated with Count Stadion, who introduced him to foreign writers of a more rationalistic sort.

fat, fāte, fār, āsk, fāre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pine; not, nōte, mōve, nōr; up, lūte, pūll; ʔn, then; ʔ, d or j; s, s or sh; t, t or ch;

On the model of Cervantes's Don Quixote he wrote his first novel, Don Sylvio von Rosalvo (1765). On reading Voltaire, he became interested in Shakespeare and produced the first German translation of Shakespeare; between 1762 and 1766 he put into German prose 22 of the plays, a feat of momentous importance for German literature. The period 1766-67 saw the appearance of what is generally considered to be his greatest novel, Die Geschichte des Agathon, the first of the so-called Bildungsromane, of which Goethe's Wilhelm Meister is the classic example. In 1769 he was made professor of philosophy and literature at the University of Erfurt. His pedagogical book, Der goldene Spiegel (1772), caused him to be called to Weimar as tutor to the young dukes Charles August and Constantine; thus he was for the rest of his life one of the famous Weimar group that later included Goethe, Herder, and Schiller. Two of his later works deserve special mention: a satire on small-town life, Die Aderliden (1774), and the verse epic Oberon (1780). He also did valuable service to German literature with his review, Der teutsche Merkur (1773-1810).

Wieland, Heinrich. b. at Pforzheim, Baden, Germany, 1777—. German organic chemist. His extensive studies of catalytic dehydrogenation are important to the understanding of biological oxidation. Wilberforce, Samuel. b. at Clapham, near London, Sept. 7, 1805; killed by a fall from his horse near Dorking, England, July 19, 1873. English prelate, bishop of Winchester; son of William Wilberforce. In 1830 he became rector of Brightstone, Isle of Wight, in 1841 chaplain to the Prince Consort, and in 1845 bishop of Oxford. In 1869 he was appointed bishop of Winchester. Though a High Churchman, he did not join the Oxford movement, but several members of his family went over to the Roman Catholic Church. His cleverness and persuasiveness of speech and manner gained him the nickname of "Soapy Sam," which he explained as due to the fact that he was "often in hot water, and always came out with clean hands." He published, with his brother Robert, a life of his father (1838), and his correspondence (1840). He wrote Note-Book of a Country Clergyman (1833), Agathos (1840), History of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America (1844), and others.

Wilberforce, William. b. at Hull, England, Aug. 24, 1759; d. at London, July 29, 1833. English philanthropist, statesman, and orator; famous as an opponent of the slave-trade. He was graduated at Cambridge (St. John's College), and in 1780 became member of Parliament for Hull. He was intimately associated with William Pitt. About 1787 he met Thomas Clarkson, and began to agitate the slavery question with the support of Pitt, who, in 1788, in the absence of Wilberforce, introduced the question in Parliament. In 1792 Wilberforce carried in the House of Commons a measure for gradual abolition, which was thrown out by the Lords. Immediate abolition of the trade was secured in 1807. He then directed his energies to the end of destroying slavery as an institution, and was one of the founders of the Anti-Slavery Society. The Emancipation Bill, abolishing slavery completely, was passed in 1833, a month after the death of Wilberforce. Wilberforce was also a champion of Catholic emancipation, a supporter of missionary societies, and an educational reformer. He wrote A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians (1797) and others.

Author of The Divorce Problem—A Study in Statistics (1897), Introduction to the Vital Statistics of the United States, 1900-1930 (1933), Studies in American Demography (1940), and other books.

Wille (vil'e), Bruno. b. at Magdeburg, Germany, Feb. 6, 1860; d. near Lindau, Germany, Sept. 4, 1928. German poet, novelist, and theater director. He was the founder of the Freie Volksbühne and the Neue Freie Volksbühne, "naturalistic" theaters with subscription audiences. When Otto Brahm's Freie Bühne (1889-90) failed in its second season Wille, along with Julius Turk and Wilhelm Bölsche, founded the Freie Volksbühne, which opened with Ibsen's Pillars of Society (1890). As the three founders were active members of the German Social Democratic Party, the theater devoted itself to social problem plays by Schiller, Hebbel, Ibsen, Hauptmann, and others. Shortly after the opening the Berlin police tried to bar women on the grounds that the performances were political meetings and German women did not have the right of political assembly. Wille went to court and successfully argued the distinction between socialist propaganda at a political meeting and the dramatic expression of the Socialist point of view in the theater. Women were at once readmitted to the theater, but Wille was voted out of the management because he had expressed a non-Socialist point of view. With the help of Emil Lessing, Maximilian Harden, Viktor Hollander, and the brothers Kempfmeyer, he then founded the Neue Freie Volksbühne, opening in November, 1892, with Goethe's Faust. In 1913 the earlier Freie Bühne and the later Neue Freie Bühne groups joined forces and built a playhouse. By 1914 they had 50,000 members and were giving Sunday performances at a dozen theaters, as well as having their own repertory theaters.

William (of Baden). [Original title, Count of Hochberg.] b. at Karlsruhe, April 8, 1792; d. Oct. 11, 1859. Margrave of Baden and German general. He commanded the Baden contingent in Napoleon's Russian campaign, and fought with the Allies (1814-15). He represented the house of Baden at the Congress of Vienna, and was commander of the Baden troops (1825-48).

William (of Brunswick). b. April 25, 1806; d. Oct. 18, 1884. Duke of Brunswick (1830-84); second son of Duke Frederick William. He succeeded his brother Charles, and was the last of the Brunswick-Wolfenbüttele line.

William I (of England). [Surnamed the Conqueror, the Norman, and the Bastard.] b. at Falaise, Normandy, in 1027 or 1028; d. at St.-Gervais, near Rouen, Sept. 9, 1087. King of England (1066-87). He was the natural son of Robert the Devil, Duke of Normandy, and Arletta, daughter of Fulbert, a tanner of Falaise. He succeeded to the duchy on the death of his father without legitimate issue in 1035. With the assistance of his suzerain, Henry I, King of France, he put down a formidable rising of his vassals in the battle of Val-ès-Dunes, near Caen, in 1047. In a war which broke out between Henry and Geoffrey, Count of Anjou, the next year, he sided with the former, and took possession of the important border fortress of Alençon and Domfront. He visited, in 1051, his childless kinsman Edward the Confessor of England, from whom he afterward claimed to have received a promise of the succession to the English throne. In 1053 he married Matilda of Flanders, a descendant of Alfred the Great. He repelled an invasion by the allied armies of Henry, Geoffrey of Anjou, and Theobald of Blois at Mortemer in 1054. Soon after he exacted the homage of Geoffrey of Anjou, and in 1058, by the victory of Varaville, repelled a second invasion headed by the French king. In 1063 he acquired Maine, which extended his southern frontier almost to the Loire. Probably in 1064, Harold, Earl of Wessex, was shipwrecked on the coast of Normandy and fell into the hands of William, who compelled him to take an oath whereby he bound himself to assist the duke in obtaining the succession in England. Edward died January 5, and Harold, in defiance of the oath, procured his own election as king by the witan. William, on the other hand, obtained a bull from Pope Alexander II, which declared him to be the rightful heir to the throne. He landed at Pevensey Sept. 28, 1066, overthrew Harold (who fell in battle) at Senlac (or Hastings), October 14, and was crowned at Westminster Dec. 25, 1066. But the conquest of England was only partial; it was completed four years later (in 1070) by the suppression of the last of a succession of English risings in the north and southwest. William exacted the homage of Malcolm III of Scotland in 1072. He put down (1075-76) a rebellion of the Norman barons in England, who thenceforth remained quiet. The rest of his reign was occupied with almost continuous wars on the Continent against the King of France and rebellious vassals, and with quarrels with members of his own family, especially with his son Robert, who headed a revolt in Normandy (1077-80), and with his half-brother Odo, bishop of Bayeux, who was imprisoned on account of his intrigues. William died of internal injuries received from the plunging of his horse in the burning cinders in the town of Mantes, which he had captured while engaged with Philip I of France in a war concerning Vexin. William made few changes in the English law; indeed, he renewed, with some additions, the "law of Edward the Confessor." However, his introduction of continental feudalism was destined to exercise an enduring social and political influence. He took care to prevent the Norman barons whom he planted on English soil from becoming formidable rivals of the crown by scattering their estates, by maintaining popular courts by the side of the manorial courts, and by requiring an oath of fealty from all landowners, thereby eliminating an essential and dangerous feature of continental feudalism, the exclusive dependence of a vassal on his lord (Gemot of Salisbury, 1086). He abolished the four great earldoms, which had threatened the integrity of the kingdom in preceding reigns, and restricted the jurisdictions of the earl to a single shire, which became the largest political division, and the government of which was practically exercised by the sheriff, who was appointed by the king. In 1086 he completed the Domesday (or Domesday) Book, a census of the wealth of England. He also reorganized the English Church with the assistance of Lanfranc whom he appointed archbishop of Canterbury. He separated the spiritual from the temporal courts, and secured the authority of the crown against papal encroachments.

William II (of England). [Surnamed Rufus.] b. c1056; d. Aug. 2, 1100. King of England (1087-1100); third (second surviving) son of William I and Matilda of Flanders. He was the favorite son of his father, to whom he remained loyal when his elder brother Robert raised the standard of rebellion in Normandy. In accordance with the dying request of his father, he was elected to the English throne by the witan, through the influence of Lanfranc, Sept. 26, 1087, while Robert succeeded in Normandy. A revolt of the Norman barons in England broke out in favor of Robert in 1088. William gained the support of the fyrd, or national militia, by promising the repeal of the forest laws, the reduction of taxes, and good government generally to his English subjects, and the rebellion was suppressed in 1090. He carried on a war in Normandy (1090-91) against his brother Robert, who was compelled to accept a disadvantageous peace. He invaded Scotland in 1091, when he exacted the homage of Malcolm III. In 1093 he appointed Anselm, abbot of Bec, archbishop of Canterbury; but presently became involved in a dispute concerning investitures with the new primate, who abandoned the kingdom in 1097. In 1094, during a second invasion of Normandy, he found his brother supported by Philip I of France, and secured the safe retreat of his army only by a bribe to the latter. In 1096 he took possession of Normandy as a pledge for funds advanced to Robert, who in that year joined the Crusade. The duchy remained in William's hands until his death. He conquered Maine (1095-99). He was killed, possibly accidentally, by an arrow shot by Walter Tyrril (or Tirel), while hunting in the New Forest.

William III (of England). b. at The Hague, Nov. 4, 1650; d. at Kensington, March 8, 1702. King of England (1689-1702), and stadholder of the United Netherlands (1672-1702). He was the son of William II, stadholder of the United Netherlands, and Mary, daughter of Charles I of England, and was styled Prince of Orange before his accession to the English throne. His father died before his birth. As the head of the house of Orange he became the leader of the democratic monarchical party in opposition to the aristocratic republican party headed by Jan de Witt. The invasion of Holland by the armies of Louis XIV in 1672 caused the overthrow of the aristocratic republican party, and in the same year the office of stadholder, which had been abolished on the death of his father, was restored in his favor. He saved Amsterdam by opening the dikes, and succeeded in forming a coalition against Louis XIV which compelled that monarch to conclude the peace of Nijmegen (1678). He married in 1677 Mary, elder daughter of the Duke of York (who later ascended the English throne as James II). About 1686 he placed himself at the head of the constitutional opposition in England against the absolute and Romanizing policy of James; and, in answer to an invitation signed by the "seven patriots" (the earls of Devonshire, Shrewsbury, and Danby, the Bishop of London, Henry Sidney, Lord Lumley, and Admiral Russell), landed at Torbay, Nov. 5, 1688. James fled to France December 22, and William summoned a convention which met Jan. 22, 1689, and settled the crown on William and Mary, who accepted the Declaration of Right, and were proclaimed Feb. 13, 1689. The revolution was effected in England without serious opposition, but James had many adherents in Scotland and Ireland. With the assistance of Louis XIV, he landed at Kinsale, Ireland, March 14, 1689. War was declared against France May 7, 1689; the Jacobite rising in Scotland ended with the battle of Killiecrankie July 27, 1689; and James was defeated in person by William at the battle of the Boyne in Ireland July 1, 1690. In 1692 occurred the massacre of Glencoe, wiping out the Highland opposition to William. On his accession to the English throne, William began the organization of the Grand Alliance (of the United Netherlands, the Holy Roman Empire, England, Spain, Brandenburg, and Savoy) against France, which was completed in 1690. A victory of the allied English and Dutch fleets over the French at La Hogue May 19, 1692, frustrated a projected invasion of England. William, who commanded the Allies in Flanders, was defeated by Marshal Luxembourg at Steenkerke Aug. 3, 1692. Queen Mary died Dec. 28, 1694; thenceforth William reigned alone. The peace of Ryswick put an end to the war with France in 1697. During the rest of his reign his foreign policy was chiefly directed to preserving the balance of power in Europe by preventing the Spanish monarchy from being united either to France or to Austria. With this end in view, he negotiated the Partition Treaties, to satisfy the various adherents of the claimants to the Spanish succession. When Louis XIV, in violation of treaty obligations, recognized the bequest of Charles II to Philip of Anjou (Philip V), William formed the Grand Alliance of 1701, and took the initiative in the events leading to the War of the Spanish Succession. He died, in consequence of a fall from his horse, before the commencement of hostilities, leaving no heirs, but with the succession settled, by act of Parliament (1701), on James I's granddaughter Sophia of Hanover and her line. His reign, although disturbed by Jacobite intrigues and the treachery of officials high in station (such as that alleged to Marlborough), witnessed the rise of England to a position of prominence in European politics, and marks the beginning of government by party, the Whigs and Tories appearing as distinct entities during his reign.

William IV (of England). b. at Windsor, Aug. 21, 1765; d. June 20, 1837. King of England (1830-37); third son of George III. He entered the navy as a midshipman c1779, was created duke of Clarence in 1789, entered (c1791) into a liaison with Dorothea Jordan, an actress, which was not ended until he married Adelaide of Saxe-Meiningen in 1818, and became heir presumptive to the throne on the death of Frederick Augustus, Duke of York, in 1827. In the same year he was appointed lord high admiral, an office which he was shortly compelled to resign on account of his arbitrary conduct and his refusal to consult with his council. He acceded to the throne on the death of his brother, George IV, June 26, 1830. The chief event of his reign were the passage, through his threat to create new peers, of the Reform Bill (1832). He was succeeded by his niece Victoria.

William I (of Germany and Prussia). (German, Wilhelm.) b. at Berlin, March 22, 1797; d. there, March 9, 1888. German emperor (1871-88) and king of Prussia (1861-88); second son of Frederick William III of Prussia and Louisa, daughter of Duke Charles of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. He served with distinction in the campaigns of 1814 and 1815 against Napoleon, married Augusta of Saxe-Weimar in 1829, and became heir presumptive and received the title of Prince of Prussia on the death of his father and the accession of his brother Frederick William IV in 1840. He made himself extremely unpopular on account of his conservative attitude during the revolutionary movement of 1848 and fled to England, but was recalled after a short time, took his place in the Prussian army which suppressed the insurrections in Baden and the Palatinate in 1849, was appointed military governor of the Rhineland and Westphalia (1849), was promoted to the rank of field marshal, and was made governor of the federal fortress of Mainz in 1854. He assumed the regency for his brother Frederick William (who had become insane) in 1858, and ascended the throne of Prussia on the death of Frederick William, Jan. 2, 1861. He appointed Otto Eduard Leopold von Bismarck minister of foreign affairs in 1862, and in consequence of Bismarck's plan to unite all Germany joined with Austria in a war against Denmark (1864), commanded in person at Königgrätz in the Austro-Prussian war (1866), and became president of the North German Confederation on the adoption of its constitution in 1867. He commanded the German armies in the Franco-Prussian War (1870-71), being present at Gravelotte and Sedan, and maintaining his headquarters at Versailles (October, 1870-March, 1871) during and after the siege of Paris. He was proclaimed German emperor at Versailles, Jan. 18, 1871, and returned to Berlin on March 17, 1871. He displayed great sagacity in selecting his ministers and generals, as well as firmness in supporting them against opposition, as, for example, in Bismarck's struggle with the Roman Catholic Church (the Kulturkampf) which William actually opposed, but which he supported as his chancellor's policy; and shares with Bismarck, Albrecht von Roon, and Helmuth von Moltke the credit for accomplishing the unification of Germany under the hegemony of Prussia.

William II (of Germany and Prussia). [Full German name, Friedrich Wilhelm Viktor Albert.] b. at Berlin, Jan. 27, 1859; d. at Doorn, Holland, June 4, 1941. Emperor of Germany and king of Prussia (1888-1918); son of Frederick III and Princess Victoria of England (daughter of Queen Victoria), and grandson of William I. He was educated at the gymnasium of Cassel and the University of Bonn, married Augusta Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein (1881), and succeeded his father as king and emperor, June 15, 1888. He immediately displayed his intention to exercise personal control of the government, and in March, 1890, dismissed Bismarck, the man who had built the German empire under the new king's grandfather, but who disapproved of his policy. He often provoked severe criticism for his impulsive handling of foreign affairs, e.g., a telegraphed expression of friendship to Paul Kruger in the course of the Boer War. Under William German industry was fostered, the German fleet was expanded to rival the British, and German colonial strength and military alliances were extended. Probably with the best intentions in the world, believing that a strong Germany, belonging to a strong Triple Alliance, and pursuing a strong foreign policy, would prevent war, he helped build up the tensions that exploded in World War I. An absolute monarch, he ignored (1917) the resolutions for peace drawn up by the Reichstag, and continued the war until the defeat of Germany in the field in World War I forced him to abdicate and flee to The Netherlands, where he was granted asylum despite half-hearted Allied attempts to have him extradited for trial as a war criminal under the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles.

William I (of Hesse). [Also, William IX (of Hesse-Cassel).] b. at Cassel, June 3, 1743; d. Feb. 27, 1821. Elector of Hesse (1803-21), landgrave of Hesse-Cassel (1785-1803); son of Landgrave Frederick II. He furnished Hessian troops to Great Britain in the American Revolutionary War, succeeded as landgrave in 1785, joined the coalition against France in 1792, was made elector in 1803, and was expelled by the French in 1806, his lands becoming part of the kingdom of Westphalia in 1807. He reentered Cassel in 1813, and was restored (1814-15) by the Congress of Vienna.

William II (of Hesse). b. July 28, 1777; d. Nov. 20, 1847. Elector of Hesse (1821-47); son of the Elector William I. He served in the Prussian army against Napoleon, and was forced to grant a new constitution in 1831.

William IV (of Hesse-Cassel). [Called "William the Wise."] b. 1532; d. Aug. 25, 1592. Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel (1567-92); son of Philip the Magnanimous, Landgrave of Hesse. He administered the government during the imprisonment of his father by Charles V (1547-52). In 1567 when Hesse was divided among Philip's four sons, he received Hesse and Cassel. He distinguished himself as an astronomer and as a patron of astronomy, the observatory of Cassel being famous for its discoveries.

William IX (of Hesse-Cassel). See William I (of Hesse). William I (of the Netherlands). [Dutch, Willem.] b. at The Hague, Aug. 24, 1772; d. at Berlin, Dec. 12, 1843. King of the Netherlands (1815-40); son of William V, the last stadtholder. He commanded the Dutch troops against the French from 1793 to 1795, when the Netherlands were conquered by the latter and the house of Orange expelled. In 1806 he served as a general in the Prussian army, and was captured by the French at the battle of Jena. His hereditary territories in Germany (the Nassau lands) were in the same year confiscated by Napoleon. He served in the Austrian army at Wagram in 1809, and afterward lived in retirement at Berlin. He recovered his German territories in 1813. On the overthrow of Napoleon, the Netherlands and Belgium were erected into the Kingdom of the Netherlands by the Congress of Vienna; and, in accordance with its decision, William was proclaimed the first king of the new monarchy, March 16, 1815. At the same time he exchanged his German possessions for the grand duchy of Luxembourg. He was unable to prevent the secession of Belgium in 1830-32. He abdicated in favor of his son William II, Oct. 7, 1840, in the face of demands for a liberal constitution.

William II (of the Netherlands). [Dutch, Willem.] b. Dec. 6, 1792; d. March 17, 1849. King of the Netherlands (1840-49); son of William I. He served with distinction under Wellington in Spain, and commanded the Dutch contingent in the campaign of 1815 against Napoleon. He married the Russian grand duchess Anne, sister of Alexander I, in 1816. He was sent to Belgium to effect a peaceful settlement on the outbreak of the revolution in that country in 1830, and on October 16 recognized the independence of the Belgians, but was forced to give way before the French in August, 1832. He ascended the throne on the abdication of his father, Oct. 7, 1840. He granted extensive reforms during the revolutionary movement of 1848.

William III (of the Netherlands). [Dutch, Willem.] b. Feb. 19, 1817; d. Nov. 23, 1890. King of the Netherlands (1849-90); son of William II. He carried out, although unwillingly, the reforms begun by his father in 1848, and decreed the abolition of slavery in the Dutch West Indies in 1862. In 1866 the Dutch province of Limburg, which since 1815 had constituted part of the Germanic Confederation, was incorporated with the Netherlands, and in the following year Luxembourg was recognized as neutral territory under the sole sovereignty of his house. He was succeeded by his daughter Wilhelmina, the male line of the house of Orange-Nassau having failed.

William I (of Normandy). [Called "Longue-Épée"; English, "Longsword."] Duke of Normandy (c927-943), son and successor of Rolf.

William I (of Orange). [Surname the Silent; Dutch, Willem.] b. at the castle of Dillenburg, in Nassau, Aug. 16, 1533; d. at Delft, the Netherlands, July 10, 1584. Prince of Orange (1544-84) and Count of Nassau (1559-84); the founder of the Republic of the United Provinces. He was the son of William, Count of Nassau, and Juliana of Stolberg, was educated in the Roman Catholic faith as a page at the court of Charles V, and inherited the principality of Orange, along with large estates in the Netherlands, from his cousin René (or Renatus) in 1544. He was appointed commander of the army in the Netherlands and governor of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht by Charles V in 1555. He served in the war of Philip II against Henry II of France, and negotiated the preliminaries of the peace of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559). He succeeded his father as count of Nassau in 1559. Together with the counts of Egmont and of Hoorn, he addressed a petition in 1563 to Philip II for the recall of Granvella, the adviser of the regent Margaret of Parma, who was carrying on a bloody persecution of the Protestants. Granvella was recalled in 1564, but Philip II's determination to suppress Protestantism and destroy the political liberties of the Dutch remained unaltered, and provoked the organization of the League of the Gueux in 1566. In 1567 Margaret of Parma was succeeded in the governorship by the Duke of Alva, who came with an army of 20,000 Spaniards and instituted a reign of terror. William, who had in the meantime resigned his offices and retired to Dillenburg, declined to appear before the Council of Blood and proclaimed (1568) his adherence to the Protestant faith. In 1568 he collected two armies, one of which was destroyed by Alva in East Friesland; the other disbanded for want of funds. He himself continued the war on land, and in 1576 brought about the Pacification of Ghent, whereby Holland, Zealand, and the southern provinces of the Lowlands united for the purpose of expelling the Spanish soldiery. This was followed in 1579 by the Union of Utrecht between the seven northern provinces (Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Gelderland, Groningen, Friesland and Overijssel), which formally declared their independence of the king of Spain in 1581, and settled the hereditary stadtholdership on William. He was assassinated at Delft by Balthasar Gérard, a French Roman Catholic zealot. William (of Prussia). b. 1783; d. 1851. Prince of Prussia; third son of Frederick William II, and brother of Frederick William III. He served as a commander in the wars against Napoleon.

William I (of Scotland). [Surname the Lion.] d. at Stirling, 1214. King of Scotland (1165-1214). He succeeded his brother Malcolm IV. In 1174 he invaded England in support of the king's rebellious sons with the result that he was taken prisoner and compelled to do homage to Henry II. He canceled this in 1189 by paying a ransom to Richard I, who needed the money for a crusade. He obtained (1188) papal sanction of the independence of the Scottish Church from the English.

William I (of Sicily). [Called "William the Bad."] King of Sicily (1154-66).

William II (of Sicily). [Called "William the Good."] King of Sicily (1166-89).

Williams, Eleazar. b. at Caughnawaga, N.Y., c1789; d. at Hogshead, N.Y., Aug. 28, 1858. American missionary among the Indians; the reputed son of Thomas Williams, a half-breed Indian, who was descended from Eunice Williams, one of the captives in the Deerfield raid of 1704. He believed himself, after an alleged interview in 1841 with the son of Louis Philippe of France, the Prince de Joinville (who denied it), to be the dauphin (Louis XVII), son of Louis XVI. He and his friends asserted that he had been secretly taken from prison and brought to this country when very young. He wrote several works on Indian subjects, and is said to have simplified the writing of the Mohawk language by eliminating superfluous letters.

Williams, Elisha. b. at Hatfield, Mass., Aug. 24, 1694; d. at Wethersfield, Conn., July 24, 1755. American clergyman, president of Yale College (1726-39).

Williams, Roger. b. at London, c1603; d. in Rhode Island, early in 1683. English colonist in New England, founder of Rhode Island. He was educated at Charterhouse School and at Cambridge, where he was graduated in 1627, took orders in the Church of England, but became a Puritan. Arriving in Massachusetts in 1631, he became pastor at Salem, but was removed by the magistrates because he questioned their power to regulate religious activities. He was assistant pastor at Plymouth (1631-33), returned to Salem in 1633, and again became pastor there in 1634. Belief in the inwardness of regeneration led him to reject authoritarianism; hence at Salem he opposed compulsory orthodoxy, urged separation from the Church of England, and led a movement for democratic local control of Massachusetts churches. Sentenced by the Massachusetts General Court to banishment in 1635, he fled to Rhode Island, where he was joined by Salem followers in 1636; he founded Providence, and established religious freedom, a liberal land-grant system, and a relatively democratic suffrage based on small freeholds. Active as a missionary among the Indians, he gained great influence and used it to keep the Narragansets peaceful in the Pequot War. In 1639 he founded the first Baptist church in America; but he soon became a Seeker, doubting authority for all existing churches. The Rhode Island settlements, fearing absorption by the orthodox colonies, sent Williams to England to seek a charter. While negotiating (1643-44) at London, he entered the revolutionary controversy, publishing tracts that vigorously championed religious freedom and democratic government. Returning with Rhode Island's first charter, he served from 1644 to 1647 as colonial governor, united discordant factions, and aided in adoption of a humane code of laws. Besides preaching non-denominational Christianity to the Indians, Williams maintained a trading post among them. His mediation between them and the Puritan colonies in 1645, 1648, and 1650 averted imminent danger of war. Because of internal discords and intervention by neighbor colonies, Williams again went to England (1651-52) and won Oliver Cromwell's support. After his return to Rhode Island, he was elected governor for three terms, reunited the colony, averted another danger of Indian war, and officially welcomed the first refugee Jews to settle in New England. In later years he frequently settled public controversies by his skill as a conciliator. His reputation rose in the 19th century, as a symbol of American principles of free speech and free worship; in the 20th century he won recognition as a precursor of American democracy who played a role on both sides of the Atlantic. His works include Key into the Language of America (1643), Mr. Cotton's Letter Examined (1644), The Bloody Tenent of Persecution (1644), Bloody Tenent Made Yet More Bloody (1652), The Hirling Ministry None of Christ's (1652), Experiments of Spiritual Life and Health (1652), and George Fox Dugged Out of His Burrows (1676). See The Irrepressible Democrat, Roger Williams, by S. H. Brockunier (1940).

He wrote prose and verse for leading American periodicals, also sending material to Scottish journals and magazines. A collected edition of his poetry appeared in 1869.

Wilson, William Bauchop. b. at Blantyre, near Glasgow, April 2, 1862; d. May 25, 1934. American miner and union leader, U.S. secretary of labor (1913-21) under Woodrow Wilson. He worked in the coal mines of Pennsylvania from 1871 (when he was nine years of age) to 1898. He was secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers of America (1900-09). He was a Democratic member of Congress (1907-13), and was chairman of the Committee on Labor in the 62nd Congress (1912-13) which drew up the bill establishing the Department of Labor. Wilson became the department's first secretary and established it on a firm basis.

Wilson, Sir William James Erasmus. b. at Aberdeen, Scotland, Nov. 25, 1809; d. at Westgate-on-Sea, England, Aug. 7, 1884. British physician, a specialist in dermatology. He was the first professor (1869 et seq.) of that specialty in the College of Surgeons (the chair was founded by him).

Wilson, William Lyne. b. May 3, 1843; d. Oct. 17, 1900. American statesman, U.S. postmaster general (1895-97) under Cleveland. He served in the Confederate army in the Civil War, taught for a time in Columbian College, and then practiced law in Charlottesville, West Virginia. He was president of West Virginia University (1882-83), and was Democratic member of Congress from West Virginia (1883-95). As chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means he introduced in 1893 the tariff bill, known as the Wilson-Gorman tariff of 1894. He was president (1897-1900) of Washington and Lee University.

Wilson, Woodrow. b. at Staunton, Va., Dec. 28, 1856; d. at Washington, D.C., Feb. 3, 1924. American statesman, educator, and writer, 28th President of the United States (1913-21). Born of Scotch Presbyterian stock, he was raised at Augusta, Ga., and Wilmington, N.C., the son of a minister who was also a professor. He attended Davidson College in North Carolina and was graduated (1879) from the College of New Jersey (later Princeton). He then turned to the study of law at the University of Virginia and established (1882) a law partnership with Edward I. Renick at Atlanta, Ga. By temperament and interest, Wilson was not fitted for ordinary law practice. He abandoned his unprofitable practice late in 1883 and entered the graduate school of the Johns Hopkins University, where he took his training under Herbert Baxter Adams. Wilson's paper "Committee or Cabinet Government?" (Overland Monthly, January, 1884) earned him a fellowship in the history department. His first book, Congressional Government (1885), written as his doctoral dissertation at Johns Hopkins, still ranks as a near classic in its field. He married (June 24, 1885) Ellen Louise Axson, by whom he subsequently had three daughters. After her death (August, 1914) he married (Dec. 18, 1915) Edith Bolling Galt. In the fall of 1885 Wilson began teaching history at Bryn Mawr College and in June, 1886, received the Ph.D. degree from Johns Hopkins. He joined (1888) the faculty of Wellesley University as professor of history and political economy and in 1890 became professor of jurisprudence and political economy at Princeton. He soon became a popular figure, both in the classroom and on the lecture platform, and on June 9, 1902, was unanimously chosen president of Princeton. His incumbency was distinguished for its administrative reforms (the preceptorial system and quad plan) in Princeton's intellectual and social life. The preceptorial system, which later became the basis of honors courses and individual tutoring at other colleges, was adopted at Princeton, but the quad plan for the democratization of student life provoked vigorous opposition among the faculty and alumni and was defeated. Wilson's battle for his ideas brought him national repute as an opponent of privilege, made him a figure respected and admired by liberals, and eventually led him into politics. He subsequently became embroiled in a controversy over the planning for the graduate school, but this was cut short by his entry into active politics. His "availability" made him, with the aid of Colonel George B. M. Harvey, the choice of Democratic machine politicians in New Jersey who had been casting about for a gubernatorial candidate to run against the Republicans. He resigned (Oct. 20, 1910) his post at Princeton and was elected (Nov. 8, 1910) governor of New Jersey. The machine politicians, who thought the mild-mannered educator would be their willing tool, were given a rude awakening when Wilson struck out on an independent course and secured the passage of a corrupt practices act, an employers' liability act, a stronger public utilities measure, and a primary election law. From his political bouts with seasoned Democratic politicians Wilson emerged victorious. His vigor and honesty drew the attention of the American people and of political leaders throughout the country. In 1911 he met Colonel E. M. House of Texas, a Democratic adviser destined to play a decisive role in Wilson's political career. House, convinced that Wilson was a presidential possibility, began working for his nomination. At the Democratic national convention held at Baltimore in 1912, Wilson's nomination, secured on the 46th ballot, broke a deadlock after William Jennings Bryan threw his support to Wilson. Wilson conducted his campaign under the banner of the "New Freedom," a program of mild liberal reform. In the three-way election of that year he received 435 electoral votes as against 88 for Theodore Roosevelt (Bull Moose Party) and eight for William Howard Taft (Republican). Wilson's electoral majority was up to that time the largest received by any presidential candidate in U.S. history. His first administration, representing a Democratic return to power after 16 years of Republican rule, established a landmark in American liberal reform. Wilson set out as the champion of the small businessman, leading the fight against powerful monopolies in an attempt to preserve the principle of free competition. His legislative program paved the middle way between the conservative and radical wings of the Democratic Party. The years 1913-14 were marked by banking and tariff reform, notably the Federal Reserve Act and the Underwood Tariff, and by the passage of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act and the establishment of the Federal Trade Commission. As a national executive, Wilson early displayed a remarkable capacity for crystallizing and guiding public opinion. Although his accomplishments in the realm of domestic affairs were memorable, Wilson was fated to play his most important role in the sphere of foreign affairs. Toward Latin-American relations he adopted a good-will policy which prefigured the "good neighbor" policy of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. However, the nonrecognition of the Huerta regime in Mexico and consequent troubled relations between the U.S. and that country led to the incident (April 21, 1914) at Veracruz, when some U.S. servicemen were killed. For a time the explosive situation threatened war, but Wilson consented to mediation. This was the first test for Wilson, a convinced pacifist with a deep sense of morality which he sought to apply to his view of foreign affairs. In the spring of 1916 he was compelled to send an expeditionary force, led by General J. J. Pershing, into Mexico in pursuit of Pancho Villa, the guerrilla leader. Already Wilson had scanned a wider horizon in his hopes for international peace. As European tension mounted in the spring of 1914, Wilson sent Colonel House to England and Germany in an effort to dissipate the rivalry between the Triple Entente and the Triple Alliance. When World War I broke out in the summer of 1914, Wilson personally favored the Allied cause, but in his public actions and pronouncements counseled strict neutrality. Throughout late 1914 and early 1915 the U.S. protested against Allied maritime control as a violation of U.S. neutrality and rights, but upon the German declaration (Feb. 4, 1915) of submarine warfare within the waters around the British Isles, Wilson shifted his protest, warning (Feb. 10, 1915) the German government that the destruction of American ships or lives would be viewed as "an indefensible violation of neutral rights" and that the German regime would be held "to a strict accountability for such acts." The first crisis came with the sinking of the passenger ship Lusitania (May 7, 1915), which resulted in a loss of 128 Americans among the more than 1,000 persons who went down with the torpedoed liner. Wilson pursued a patient but firm policy which led to the resignation (June, 1915) of Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan, whose pacifism prevented him from remaining in office. After the Lusitania crisis Wilson was determined that the Germans must give due warning before sinking merchant ships and make provisions for the safety of all persons aboard the vessels. Following the sinking (August, 1915) of the Arabic, the German government promised not to attack "liners" without warning; and after the Sussex was sent to the bottom early in 1916 the German authorities agreed, in reply to the U.S. ultimatum, to abandon what Wilson termed "ruthless" submarine warfare. The alternative, Wilson pointed out, was a diplomatic break with Germany. For Wilson, who took the helm of U.S. foreign policy after Bryan's resignation, though Robert Lansing was nominally secretary of state, the issue was ultimately one involving national sovereignty. But in keeping his country out of war, Wilson not only desired to spare the American people from the heavy sacrifices demanded by modern warfare; he also sought to preserve for America a role as mediator among the nations at war. As he wrote (Aug. 21, 1915) to Colonel House: "It would be a calamity to the world at large if we should be actively drawn into the conflict and so deprived of all disinterested influence over the settlement." In the autumn of 1915 Wilson sent House on another European tour in an attempt to secure Allied and German agreement to a peace conference. On this occasion a memorandum was drafted by House and the British foreign secretary, Sir Edward Grey, pointing to the possibility of U.S. entry into the war should Germany fail to agree to a conference. The memorandum was sanctioned by Wilson. In this, as in earlier and later efforts to end the war, Wilson was unsuccessful, although his object, as he declared on Jan. 22, 1917, was "peace without victory." Congress backed his publicly declared policy, and the nation supported it in the elections of 1916. The initial returns were so close that Wilson went to bed on election night believing that he had lost the contest to the Republican candidate, Charles E. Hughes. However, Western returns finally gave Wilson 277 electoral votes as against 254 for Hughes. It was generally recognized that a large pacifist element helped keep Wilson in office. The Germans, after warning Wilson that they planned a resumption of unrestricted submarine warfare unless peace negotiations were begun, made good their threat by taking the decision in secret (Jan. 9, 1917) and announcing it to the U.S. on Jan. 31, 1917. Wilson immediately replied with a diplomatic break; the publication of the notorious "Zimmerman note" added fuel to the crisis; and the sinking of several American ships led Wilson to his fateful and reluctant decision. He appeared (April 2, 1917) before Congress and asked a declaration of war against Germany that was granted on April 6, 1917. By this time Wilson was convinced that Germany stood condemned as guilty of having committed grave international crimes. Wilson's accomplishments as a war leader and administrator were outstanding. He dramatized the issues for the American people in declarations that carried the conviction of profound moral purpose and an appeal to lofty ideals, notably in his enunciation (Jan. 8, 1918) of the Fourteen Points. The complex machinery set up under his supervision for the prosecution of the war harnessed the resources of the nation to the military and naval effort that witnessed the dispatch of a huge expeditionary force to France. The events on the Western Front were fortified by Wilson's diplomacy, which secured the confidence of the German government and induced its leaders to agree (October, 1918) to an armistice, signed on Nov. 11, 1918. At this juncture Wilson's reputation was at its highest point; but he committed several grave errors which later helped undermine his program and personal position. His peace commission to the Versailles Conference offended the Senate and the Republican Party by its virtual exclusion of representatives from those two bodies; he made the elections of November, 1918, in which the Democrats suffered a setback, an issue of confidence in his leadership; and he chose to make a personal appearance at Versailles where, despite his success in incorporating the League of Nations Covenant in the peace treaty, he became enmeshed in difficulties springing from the wide gap between his declared principles and the realities of political compromise. The peoples of Europe had been prone to regard him as an apostle of peace and the savior of a wrecked continent; after the conference his standing deteriorated rapidly, although American public opinion appeared to support his League proposals. At home, his tactics helped make the treaty a partisan issue. Wilson adamantly refused to make compromises with the Senate on the treaty and the League Covenant. His appearance before the hearings of the Senate committee on foreign relations led to bad feeling between him and the committee's chairman, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, and was construed as a conflict of authority between Wilson and the Senate. It was at this time that Wilson admitted his knowledge of the Allied secret treaties of 1915 and 1916; although he indicated that he had first learned of them at Versailles, Wilson in reality had been generally cognizant of them in April, 1917. Early in September, 1919, Wilson began a nation-wide tour to secure popular support for his program. Physical and mental fatigue burdened him, and at Pueblo, Colo., on Sept. 25, 1919, he was threatened by a complete nervous and physical collapse. He returned to Washington where, on Oct. 2, 1919, he became paralyzed. He was incapacitated for many months thereafter and withdrew from all important activity. The Senate finally defeated approval of the treaty after Wilson's supporters, at his instigation, refused to accept the Lodge reservations. After leaving office, Wilson lived in quiet retirement in the national capital. He is in the first rank of the great liberal democrats who have occupied the White House and represents the continuing link between the political philosophy of Jefferson and the doctrines of the New Deal. He is remembered primarily for his role on the world stage, although the heated dispute between Wilson and the Senate has often overshadowed the fact that Wilson did more than any man in his time to raise the U.S. to the level of a world power. That his life closed amid tragedy, misunderstanding, and bitterness cannot obscure the moral fervor and far-reaching vision of the statesman, whose dream of international peace is still a challenge to later generations. Among his works are The State (1889), Division and Reunion, 1829-1889 (1893), An Old Master and Other Political Essays (1893), Mere Literature and Other Essays (1896), George Washington (1896), A History of the American People (5 vols., 1902), and Constitutional Government in the U.S. (1903). See The Public Papers of Woodrow Wilson, edited by R. S. Baker and W. E. Dodd (6 vols., 1925-27).

Wilson's Creek (wíl'sonz). Small river near Springfield, Mo. Here on Aug. 10, 1861, the Confederates under Ben McCulloch and Sterling Price defeated a Union force under Nathaniel Lyon, who was killed in the battle.

Wilson v. New, 243 U.S. 332 (1917) (wíl'son; nū). U.S. Supreme Court decision upholding the constitutionality of the Adamson Act of 1916. The majority opinion, delivered by Chief Justice Edward D. White, upheld the national power to establish an eight-hour day and stressed the "public interest" doctrine in its application to rail transportation.

Wilts and Berks Canal (wíltz; bérks). Canal in S England, in Wiltshire and Berkshire. It extends NE across Wiltshire from the Avon in the vicinity of Trowbridge, past Swindon, then crosses the N part of Berkshire, and reaches the river Thames at Abingdon. It now handles a negligible amount of traffic. Length, 52 mi.

Wiltshire (wílt'shír). [Often shortened to Wilts (written without a period).] County in S England. It is bounded on the NW and N by Gloucestershire, on the E by Berkshire and Hampshire, on the S by Dorsetshire and Hampshire, on the SW by Dorsetshire, and on the W by Somersetshire. The Vale of Pewsey, extending from E to W, divides the county into a northern portion consisting mainly of a fertile plain, rising toward the NW in the direction of the Cotswold Hills in Gloucestershire, and a southern division, containing the Salisbury Plain, rich in archaeological material, with an upland region in the SW part of the county. The Marlborough Downs are in the N part. The principal rivers are the Upper Avon, the Lower Avon, and the Kennet. Much of the county is under permanent pasture, devoted to cattle, from which the county supplies milk to the London markets. The county is noted for its bacon and cheese. Farms are comparatively large, and some wheat is raised. Manufacturing includes gloves, broadcloth, carpets, steelware and cutlery, and ropes and sacking. There is a large locomotive and railway-car works at Swindon. Wiltshire was part of the ancient kingdom of Wessex. County seat, Salisbury; area, ab. 1,345 sq. mi.; pop. 387,379 (1951).

SE of Heidelberg; health resort. An old town, it has remains of medieval walls, various churches of the 13th-18th centuries, and ruins of an imperial palace of the 11th century. Pop. ab. 5,000.

Wimpfen (wém'fén), Emmanuel Félix de. b. at Laon, France, Sept. 13, 1811; d. at Paris, Feb. 26, 1884. French general. He served in the Crimean and Italian wars and in Algeria, suppressed an insurrection on the border of Morocco in 1870, and was a corps commander in the Franco-Prussian War. He succeeded MacMahon as commander at Sedan on Sept. 1, 1870, and signed the capitulation of Sedan (Sept. 2, 1870).

Winant (wí'nant), John Gilbert. b. at New York, Feb. 3, 1889; committed suicide, at Concord, N.H., Nov. 3, 1947. American government official and diplomat. He was a member (1917, 1921, 1923) of the New Hampshire legislature, and was governor (1925-26, 1931-34) of New Hampshire. He organized and served (1935-37)

as chairman of the U.S. Social Security Board, was director (1939-41) of the International Labor Office at Geneva, and was U.S. ambassador to Great Britain (1941-46). In 1946 he was appointed U.S. representative to UNESCO. Author of Letter from Grosvenor Square (1948).

Winchell (win'chel), Alexander. b. at Northeast, Dutchess County, N.Y., Dec. 31, 1824; d. at Ann Arbor, Mich., Feb. 19, 1891. American geologist. He became (1854) professor of physics and civil engineering at the University of Michigan, and was professor there of geology, zoology, and botany (1855-73). In 1879 he was made professor of geology and paleontology. He was director of the geological surveys of Michigan and Minnesota in 1859. He wrote reports of geological surveys, Sketches of Creation (1870), Doctrine of Evolution (1874), The Geology of the Stars (1874), Reconciliation of Science and Religion (1877), Preadamites (1880), Sparks from a Geologist's Hammer (1881), World Life: a Comparative Geology (1883), Geological Excursions (1884), Geological Studies (1886), and other works.

Winchell, Newton Horace. b. at Northeast, Dutchess County, N.Y., Dec. 17, 1839; d. at Minneapolis, Minn., May 2, 1914. American geologist and mineralogist, head of the geological survey of the state of Minnesota (1872-1900). In 1888 he established the American Geologist, which he edited for 18 years.

Winchell, Walter. b. at New York, April 7, 1897—. American journalist. He went on the stage (c1910) as a child actor with Gus Edwards's company and by 1917 had his own vaudeville act; in 1918 he was on the Pantages vaudeville circuit in a "double" act. Winchell began writing a column for the New York Vaudeville News in 1922 and in 1924 became a member of the staff of the New York Graphic, a newspaper often considered the epitome of tabloid journalism; Winchell conducted a column for the paper, and was drama editor, drama critic, amusement editor, and advertising solicitor. It was with the Graphic that he worked out the style which later made him famous. In 1929 he shifted to William Randolph Hearst's New York Mirror, in which his column, Your Broadway and Mine, appeared (it is often said to have accounted for the major part of the paper's circulation). Winchell published gossip about the famous and notorious, some of it inaccurate, some of it startlingly true; his announcements of "blessed events" months before the expected births are said at times to have informed fathers of their wives' condition. Interspersed with these items were anecdotes and funny stories and such running "gags" as Winchell's supposed feud with bandleader Ben Bernie. During the middle 1930's Winchell began to expand his material to include comments on the news; his coverage of the Bruno Hauptmann trial for the kidnaping of Charles A. Lindbergh's son brought him to the forefront of American popular reporters. He broadcast weekly material in the same vein as his newspaper column and his rapid speech and the clicking of a telegraph key became familiar Sunday-night sounds throughout the U.S.; his audience both on radio and through his now syndicated column numbered well over 25 million persons. Winchell, though working for Hearst, crusaded for causes that ran counter to the editorial policy of the Hearst papers; he was an interventionist when Hearst was isolationist and a champion of the New Deal when the New Deal was anathema to Hearst. Winchell has had a number of imitators but none who matched either his elaborate organization for gathering news items for his column or his liveliness in conveying his meaning by nonce words or combinations.

Winchelsea (win'chel-si). Civil parish and ancient town in SE England, in East Sussex, situated on the English Channel ab. 7 mi. NE of Hastings, ab. 73 mi. SE of London by rail. It is one of the Cinque Ports, and is known for its 14th-century Church of Saint Thomas à Becket. 130 (1931).

Winchendon (win'chen-don). Town (in Massachusetts the equivalent of township in many other states) and unincorporated village in N Massachusetts, in Worcester County, ab. 15 mi. NW of Fitchburg; manufactures of toys. Pop. of town, 6,585 (1950); of village, 4,019 (1950).

Winchester. [Ancient British name, Caer Gwent or Caer Went; Latin, Venta Belgarum.] City and municipal borough in S England, in Southampton administrative county, Hampshire, ab. 11 mi. NE of Southampton, ab. 66 mi. SW of London by rail. The interior of its cathedral presents much that is of interest. The long nave is light and well-proportioned, with elaborate English groining, and the aisled transepts are of the most impressive early Norman work. The fine carved stalls are of the 13th century. Among the many interesting tombs is that of Isaac Walton (1683). The Great Hall, part of a castle built by William the Conqueror, contains the so-called Round Table of King Arthur. Winchester was successively a British, a Roman, and a Saxon town. It was the capital of Wessex, the place of residence and coronation of early English kings, and the seat of early English Parliaments. In the Middle Ages it was noted for its commerce, and was especially famous for woollen manufactures. It had one of the earliest recorded weavers' guilds. 25,710 (1951).

Winchester. City in E Indiana, county seat of Randolph County. 5,467 (1950).

Winchester. City in N Kentucky, county seat of Clark County, in a coal and petroleum region; manufactures of flour, wood products, and agricultural machinery. It was incorporated in 1793 and named for Winchester, Va. In the early 19th century it was an important marketing center for bluegrass and for short-horn cattle. 9,226 (1950).

Winchester. Town in E Massachusetts, in Middlesex County, ab. 8 mi. NW of Boston. It is chiefly a residential community. 15,509 (1950).

Winchilsea, Countess of. Title of Finch, Anne.

Winckelmann (ving'kel-män), Johann Joachim. b. at Stendal, Germany, Dec. 9, 1717; d. at Trieste, June 8, 1768. German critic and author, the founder of scientific archaeology and of the history of classic art. He was the son of a poor shoemaker. With the assistance of the rector of his school he was enabled to go to the Gymnasium (advanced secondary school) at Berlin, and subsequently (1738) studied theology at Halle, where he supported himself by giving private instruction. In 1743 he received a position in the school at Seehausen; in 1748 he was made librarian to the Count von Bünau at Dresden, where he had an opportunity to continue the study of art and archaeology, begun at the University of Halle. In 1754 he became a convert to the Roman Catholic Church, and in 1755 was sent by the papal nuncio to Italy. He devoted himself thenceforth entirely to the study of art. In 1764 appeared his principal work, Geschichte der Kunst des Altertums. A previous work was Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst (1755). For a number of years he was papal antiquary at Rome. In 1768 he set out on a journey to Germany, but at Vienna turned back toward Italy. He was murdered at Trieste by an Italian for some coins in his possession.

Winckler (vink'ler), Hugo. b. at Gräfenheimschen, Germany, July 4, 1863; d. at Berlin, April 19, 1913. German Assyriologist. He served as professor (1904 et seq.) at the University of Berlin. He excavated at Sidon (1903-04) and later, at Boghazkeui (1906-12), identified the capital of the ancient Hittites and recovered a group of cuneiform tablets in the Hittite language. Author of Geschichte Israels (1895-1900), Die Gesetze Hammurabis (1902), Altorientalische Forschungen (1893-1906), and others.

Winckler, Josef. b. near Rheine, Germany, 1881—. German poet and prose writer, who turned from his original career of dentistry to writing. He is perhaps best known for his anecdotal Der tolle Bomberg (1923). His first output was verse (Eiserne Sonette, 1914; Mitten im Weltkrieg, 1915). He founded a society, Werkleute auf Hals Nyland, for the culture and uplift of working people.

Windsau (vin'dous), Adolf. b. at Berlin, Dec. 25, 1876—. German biochemist. He became (1903) instructor of applied medicinal chemistry at the University of Freiburg im Breisgau, was named (1913) professor at Innsbruck, and became (1915) professor and director of the chemical laboratory at the University of Göttingen. He devoted his attention to physical, chemical, and zoological problems, and worked on cholesterol (1903), sterins, digital-glucosides, colchicine, imidazoles, and similar cardiac poisons. He investigated the chemical nature of foodstuffs, in which field he brought to light very valuable information regarding vitamins. In 1928 he was awarded the Nobel prize in chemistry for his work in investigating the constitution of sterins and their connection with the vitamin-D group.

d'Orléans, has been lost. All are painted in the same style, in three-quarter length, with lightly draped busts, bare-headed with hair in ringlets, and with landscape backgrounds.

Windsor Castle. A residence of the royal family of Great Britain, at Windsor, in Berkshire. The castle consists of buildings enclosing, or situated within, two wards or courts, with a large Round Tower topping an artificial mound in the center. According to Froissart, it was anciently believed that this mound was the site of the hall which sheltered King Arthur's Round Table, and it seems probable that it was in fact a place of some importance in Celtic Britain. Moreover it is certain that there was a stronghold at Windsor in Saxon times; but it was William the Conqueror who, attracted by the proximity of a great forest full of game, made it the chief royal seat in England and began the construction which was added to by other monarchs during the following centuries. When Edward III established (c1346) the Order of the Garter, he enlarged the Round Tower to be its place of assembly. Around the castle lies the Home Garden, from which the Long Walk extends southward to the Great Garden. Seen from the beautifully landscaped gardens and surrounding terraces, the long battlemented walls, broken by the Norman Gateway and by several towers and dominated by the central donjon, are very impressive. The east side of the quadrangle is occupied by the royal family's private apartments, and the north side by state apartments. There are also apartments for guests, a deanery, cloisters, accommodations for canons, a guard room, and quarters for military pensioners. The notable Chapel of Saint George and the Albert Chapel face the lower ward. The former, begun by Edward IV and completed by Henry VIII, is one of the most beautiful structures in the Perpendicular style in all England. The wide interior has double transepts and elaborate fan vaulting. The choir is bordered by the ornately carved stalls of the Knights of the Garter, each adorned with the owner's arms and banner. Over an admired reredos at the east end of this chapel, a great stained-glass window commemorates the late Prince Albert, Queen Victoria's consort. To him also is dedicated the Albert Chapel, to the east of Saint George's. This is a restoration, by Victoria, of a structure begun by Henry VII; under it, since the time of George III, are royal tombs. The interior of the Albert Chapel is decorated very lavishly, encrusted with varicolored marble and adorned with sculpture, mosaics, gilding, and precious stones. The stained-glass windows present Scriptural subjects and scenes from the history of the Saxe-Coburg-Gotha family to which Prince Albert belonged. Toward the east end of the building is a cenotaph of that prince in the form of an altar-tomb. Victoria and Albert are interred, however, in a mausoleum built by Victoria at nearby Frogmore, a structure of modified Byzantine architecture, octagonal in plan, surmounted by a lantern and ornamented with a series of arcades. Saint George's Hall, another feature of the castle, contains many portraits of British sovereigns, and a wealth of pictures, including many Van Dycks, is to be seen in the Waterloo chamber or great dining room, in the council chamber, in the state drawing room, in the old ballroom, and in the library, where moreover there is a great collection of notable drawings, including many by Raphael, Michelangelo, and Leonardo da Vinci, and scores of portraits in sepia and chalk by Holbein. The Younger of persons eminent at the court of Henry VIII. The private apartments contain one of the most splendid collections of porcelain, especially of Sèvres ware, in existence.

Wingate (wing'gāt, wing'-), George Wood. b. at New York, July 1, 1840; d. at Brooklyn, N.Y., March 22, 1928. American lawyer and small-arms expert. As officer in the National Guard at New York, he introduced (1867) rifle practice as part of the military instruction and drew up rules for its systematic use. He was an organizer (1871) and for 25 years president of the National Rifle Association. He wrote Wingate's Manual of Rifle Practice (1872).

Wingate, Orde Charles. b. in the Himalayas, in Burma, Feb. 26, 1903; d. March 24, 1944. British soldier. Trained at the military academy at Woolwich, he served with British forces in the Sudan (1928-35) and in Palestine (1936-39), becoming during the latter tour of duty an expert in guerrilla tactics. During World War II he commanded (while ranking only as a major) the British and Ethiopian forces which defeated the Italians in Ethiopia (1941), after which he was made a brigadier and transferred to India. Between January and May, 1942, the Japanese had driven British, Indian, and Burmese troops out of Burma. A British counterattack was checked, and the Japanese advance threatened India.

Wingate drew up plans for an extensive raid behind the Japanese lines in Burma and led 3,000 men and about a thousand animals (horses, mules, elephants, and dogs) into that country. Having been intensively trained in guerrilla tactics suited to jungle warfare, his English, fat, fāte, fār, āsk, fāre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pine; not, nōte, mōve, nōr; up, lūte, pūll; ʔ, then; d, d or j; s, s or sh; t, t or ch;

Ghurka, and Burmese contingents, lightly armed but especially equipped for jungle existence, operated in several columns, penetrating the enemy-held region as deeply as 300 miles. After blowing up railways, bridges, and military supply dumps, and otherwise harassing the Japanese communications for three months, about half of the raiders made their way back to India. The operation was of value in disrupting Japanese operations, still more so in demonstrating that British and Indian troops, properly trained and led, could hold their own against the Japanese in jungle strife, and most valuable of all in demonstrating that such operations could be carried on without the support of supply trains on the ground, for Wingate's columns, after crossing the Chindwin River (a large tributary of the Irrawaddy), were supplied only by air, while communications were maintained by air and by radio. Thus a pattern was set for those air-supplied operations which were later not only to liberate Burma, but to have a profound influence on the art and practice of modern warfare. Promoted to the rank of major general, Wingate was given command of a larger force which was flown into upper Burma, but before this campaign had fairly begun he was killed in an airplane accident.

Wisconsin (wis.kon'sin). [Called the "Badger State."] State of the N United States, bounded by Lake Superior, Michigan (partly separated by the Menominee River), and Lake Michigan on the N, Lake Michigan on the E, Illinois on the S, and Iowa (separated by the Mississippi River) and Minnesota (separated for the most part by the Mississippi and St. Croix rivers) on the W.

Population, Area, and Political Divisions. Wisconsin is divided for administrative purposes into 71 counties. The state sends ten representatives to Congress, and has 12 electoral votes. Leading cities are Green Bay, Kenosha, Madison, Milwaukee, Racine, and Superior. Capital, Madison; area, 54,715 sq. mi. (56,154 sq. mi., including water, but excluding water of the Great Lakes); pop. 3,434,575 (1950), an increase of 9.5 percent over the 1940 figure. The state ranks 25th in area, and (on the basis of the 1950 census) 14th in population.

Terrain and Climate. The state is hilly in the N and SW and level elsewhere. Sugarbush Hill (1,950 ft.), in the NE region, is the highest point in the state. The important rivers of the state, aside from the Menominee on the N boundary and the Mississippi and the St. Croix on the W boundary, include the Wisconsin, rising in the N, flowing S and then W into the Mississippi, somewhat below Prairie du Chien; the Black and the Chippewa, also tributaries of the Mississippi. In the NE is Green Bay, a deep indentation of Lake Michigan. There are several large lakes, including Winnebago, Chippewa, Poygan, Koshkonong, and Mendota, as well as hundreds of small lakes of glacial origin. The state has extreme winters in the N part, and a great snowfall there.

Industry, Agriculture, and Trade. Agriculture is one of the great industries of the state, which ranks first in the production of dairy cattle, milk, cheese, and condensed milk products and third in the production of butter. Wisconsin also ranks high in the production of cranberries, corn, oats, wheat, barley, hay, tobacco, vegetables, fruits, chickens, and eggs. Rich in timber, the state has in the past been a great lumbering state. The chief manufactures include food and food products, motor vehicles and allied items, tractors, engines, textiles, paper and paper products, aluminum and enamelled iron ware, and footwear. Superior, at the head of Lake Superior, is one of the leading ports and railroad centers. Milwaukee, on Lake Michigan, is the chief railroad center and an industrial city of high rank; known also for its breweries. Mining centers on iron, lead, and zinc; lime and granite are also found. Annual income in the state from agriculture ranges as high as two billion dollars; from mineral output, as high as 29 million; from manufacturing, as high as 2,261,174,000 dollars.

History. Wisconsin was early explored by French fur traders and missionaries. Nicolet visited it in 1634. The first permanent mission was founded (1665) by the Jesuit Father Claude Allouez, but it was not until some years later that actual permanent settlement occurred. The region was ceded (1763) by the French to the English. In 1787 it was included in the Northwest Territory, and afterward in the Indiana Territory (1800), in the Illinois Territory (1809), and in the Michigan Territory (1818). Wisconsin Territory was organized in 1836 and included not only the present state but Iowa, Minnesota, fät, fäte, fär, äsk, färe; net, mē, hēr; pin, pine; not, nōte, möve, nōr; up, lüte, püll; ʔh, then; ɔ, d or j; ʃ, s or sh; ʒ, t or ch;

and a good part of North and South Dakota. Wisconsin was admitted to the Union (as the 30th state) on May 29, 1848. The early settlers were long troubled by Indians, but the Indians were subdued (1832) in the Black Hawk War.

Culture. Wisconsin's urban and rural populations are fairly evenly balanced (ab. 58 percent of the 1950 population was classified as urban). A sizable proportion of the population are of German, Scandinavian, and Polish origin. About 6,000 Indians live on reservations and some 7,000 elsewhere in the state. The consumer cooperative movement in the U.S. had its origin at Superior, which has become the national center of that movement. Milwaukee is a cultural and educational center, known for its German traditions, and particularly its love of music. Madison, a cultural and educational city, is known as the place where the Wisconsin Progressive movement, under the leadership of Robert M. La Follette, was launched. Among the institutions of higher learning in the state are the state-supported University of Wisconsin, at Madison, with a branch at Milwaukee; Beloit College, at Beloit; Marquette University, at Milwaukee. The state motto is "Forward." The state flower is the violet.

Wisconsin Idea. Designation applied to the collaboration (c1901 et seq.) between the Progressive administration in Wisconsin under Robert M. La Follette and technical experts drawn from the University of Wisconsin in the preparation of reform legislation and the establishment of administrative commissions.

Wisconsin River. River in Wisconsin. It rises on the border of Wisconsin and Michigan, flows S and W, and joins the Mississippi near Prairie du Chien. In its course were originally several small cataraacts, including the Dalles of the Wisconsin, now partly submerged behind a dam. Length, ab. 430 mi.

Wisdom of Solomon (sol⁵mon). Book of the. [Shortened titles, Wisdom, Book of Wisdom.] One of the deuterocanonical books of the Old Testament; it is placed in the Apocrypha of the Authorized Version but appears as a canonical book in the Roman Catholic Bible. Tradition ascribes its authorship to Solomon; but by most modern Protestant theologians it is attributed to an Alexandrian Jew of the 1st or 2nd century B.C. The shorter title "Wisdom," or "Book of Wisdom," is commonly applied to this book.

Wise (wiz), Aaron. b. at Eger, Hungary, May 2, 1844; d. at New York, March 30, 1896. American rabbi; father of Stephen Samuel Wise. He received (1867) his rabbinical degree at the Jewish Seminary of Eisenstadt and his Ph.D. from the University of Halle, arrived (1874) in the U.S., and served (1875-96) as rabbi of Temple Rodeph Shalom at New York. He helped found (1886) the Jewish Theological Seminary of New York.

Wise, Henry Alexander. b. at Drummondton, Va., Dec. 3, 1806; d. at Richmond, Va., Sept. 12, 1876. American statesman and orator; cousin of Henry Augustus Wise. He was a member of Congress from Virginia (1833-44), served as U.S. minister to Brazil (1844-47), and was elected on an anti-Know-Nothing platform as governor of Virginia and served 1856-60. He opposed secession, but followed his state and became a Confederate brigadier general. He was defeated in the Kanawha valley in 1861, and at Roanoke Island in 1862.

Wise, Henry Augustus. [Pseudonym, Henry Gringo.] b. at Brooklyn, N.Y., May 24, 1819; d. at Naples, Italy, April 2, 1869. American naval officer and author; cousin of Henry Alexander Wise. He served in the navy during the Mexican War and was an officer in the Union navy during the Civil War. He was named (1864) chief of the bureau of ordnance. Author of Los Gringos (1849), Tales for the Marines (1855), Scampavia from Gibe-Tarek to Stamboul (1857), and Captain Brand, of the "Centipede" (1864).

Wise, Isaac Mayer. b. at Steingrub, in Bohemia, March 29, 1819; d. at Cincinnati, Ohio, March 26, 1900. American rabbi and editor. He emigrated to the U.S. in 1846, and was a rabbi at Albany and Cincinnati. He was the leader of the Jewish reform party in the U.S., and the leading spirit in founding its three main organizations, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the Hebrew Union College, and the Central Conference of American Rabbis. He edited The American Israelite.

Wise, John. b. at Roxbury, Mass., in August, 1652; d. April 8, 1725. American Congregational clergyman. He served (1680-1725) as a minister at Chebacco, a parish of Ipswich, Mass. He was a leader of his townspeople in the resistance (1687) to the provincial tax levied by Governor Edmund Andros, led the movement for democratic rule in the New England Congregational Church, and in 1703 petitioned the General Court of Massachusetts to reverse the convictions of those sentenced for witchcraft.

Wise, Stephen Samuel. b. at Budapest, Hungary, 1874; d. at New York, April 19, 1949. American rabbi and civic leader; son of Aaron Wise. He founded (1907) the Free Synagogue at New York, of which he served (1907-49) as rabbi. As the leader of a congregation notable for its inauguration of free unassigned pews and the principle of complete freedom of expression for the rabbi, he emerged as one of the most influential voices in the American Jewish community. Active in the Zionist movement, he was a founder (1898) of the Zionist Organization of America, of which he was later president (1917, 1936-38), and served as president of the American Jewish Congress, whose representatives he led at the Versailles Peace Conference (1919). He founded (1922) the Jewish Institute of Religion at New York and organized the World Jewish Congress. Author of How To Face Life (1917) and Child Versus Parent (1922).

Wise, Thomas James. b. at Gravesend, England, Oct. 7, 1859; d. at Hampstead, London, May 13, 1937. English bibliographer, bibliophile, and literary forger. He edited with Sir Edmund Gosse the letters and works of Swinburne and unpublished writings of Browning, Landor, Rossetti, and others, and compiled bibliographies of Tennyson, Swinburne, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Ruskin, the Brontës, Byron, and others. One of the most famous collectors in England, Wise was demonstrated (in a pamphlet written by John Carter and Graham Pollard, 1934) to have distributed a number of patent forgeries to collectors who trusted his judgment in such matters.

Wiseman (wiz'man), Nicholas Patrick Stephen. b. at Seville, Spain, Aug. 2, 1802; d. at London, Feb. 15, 1865. English cardinal and theologian. He was professor and rector (1828 et seq.) at the English college at Rome, was made bishop in partibus in 1840, and vicar apostolic in 1849, and became archbishop of Westminster and cardinal in 1850. Wiseman's influence on the Roman Catholic revival in England (stemming from the Oxford Movement) was great, and he had a prominent role in allaying the suspicion, with his Appeal to the English People, that an attempt was being made to bring England within the territories of the Roman church. Among his works are Horae Syriacae (1828), The Connection between Science and Revealed Religion (1836), Lectures on the Catholic Church (1836), The Real Presence (1836), and others. He wrote a historical novel on the early church, Fabiola, or the Church of the Catacombs (1854).

Wishart (wish'art), George. b. early in the 16th century; burned at the stake at St. Andrews, Scotland, March 1, 1546. Scottish reformer and martyr. He was schoolmaster at Montrose, and was charged with heresy there (c1538) for teaching the New Testament in Greek. In 1543 he was a tutor at Cambridge. In the same year he went to Scotland with the commission sent by Henry VIII, to arrange a treaty for the marriage of his son Edward (aged 6) and the infant Mary, Queen of Scots. He began and diligently continued to preach the doctrines of the Reformation and, at the instigation of Cardinal David Beaton, was burned at St. Andrews. He had great influence on John Knox.

Wishart, George. b. 1599; d. 1671. Scottish bishop. He was deprived of his living for refusal to subscribe the Covenant, but was made bishop of Edinburgh in 1662.

Witte (vit'e), Count Sergei Yulyevich. [Also, Count Sergius Witte.] b. at Tiflis, June 29, 1849; d. at St. Petersburg (now Leningrad), March 13, 1915. Russian statesman. He was graduated from the university at Odessa in 1870. As an official of the southwestern railways he rendered great service to Russia in the Russo-Turkish war in 1878, and after holding various administrative offices in connection with the Russian railway systems was appointed in February, 1892, minister of ways of communication, and was minister of finance (1892-1903). To his efforts is largely due the completion of the Trans-Siberian Railway. He was appointed secretary of state in 1896, actual privy councillor in 1899, and president of the committee of ministers in 1903. Witte's efforts to modernize Russian economic life resulted in his removal from his place of prominence because of the enemies he had made, but with the defeat of Russia in the war with Japan and the revolution of 1905 he again came to the fore. In 1905 he was sent to the U.S. to negotiate with Japan the terms of peace which were formulated in the treaty of Portsmouth, and in October, 1905, the emperor entrusted him with the forming of the new cabinet. Witte's efforts to maintain a moderate policy caused him to be disliked by both radicals and reactionaries, and when no quick political peace was forthcoming Witte, as sponsor of representative government, fell from the czar's favor. He resigned the premiership, May 2, 1906, and was appointed a member of the Council of the Empire, May 11, 1906. He published Principles of Railway Tariffs (1884).

Wladislaw I (of Poland) (lad'slô). [Also: Wladislaw (or Ladislaus) I Lokietek; Polish, Władysław (vlâ.dî.slâf).] b. 1260; d. at Kraków, Poland, March 2, 1333. King of Poland (1320-33). He broke with Bohemia (1305) and proclaimed Poland's independence, reestablishing the principality. His reign as duke, prince, and king was marked by wars, notably against the Teutonic Order.

Wladislaw II (of Poland). See Jagello.

Wladislaw III (of Poland). [Also, Wladislaw V of Hungary.] b. 1424; killed in the battle of Varna, Bulgaria, Nov. 10, 1444. King of Poland (1434-44); son of Wladislaw II (Jagello). He became king of Hungary in 1440. He entered the successful crusade (1443) against the Turks that gained Walachia for Hungary and brought freedom to Serbia, but he failed to observe the truce agreed upon and, invading Bulgaria, attempted to continue the war. He was killed in the ensuing battle.

Wladislaw IV (of Poland). b. 1595; d. May 20, 1648. King of Poland (1632-48); son of Sigismund III. In the period following the death of Boris Godunov, he was put forward as a claimant to the Russian throne and, had it not been for the ambition of his father to rule, might have succeeded, but Sigismund's interference resulted in a coalition of the boyars, the expulsion of the Poles, and the election of the Romanovs. After Wladislaw became king, he regained Smolensk in a war against Russia (1632-34), and was successful against the Turks and Swedes. The internal disorder in Poland claimed his attention after 1635, but his efforts to consolidate the royal power failed and the revolt of the Cossacks under Bogdan Chmielnicki resulted in the loss of Ukrainian territory.

He served as undersecretary for foreign affairs under Aberdeen and Palmerston (1852-56, 1857-61), advocated a policy of firmness against the Fenians while lord lieutenant of Ireland (1864-66), and was lord privy seal in Gladstone's first cabinet (1868-70). During his first term as colonial secretary (1870-74), he formed Rupert's Land into the province of Manitoba (1870), brought British Columbia into Canada, and saw Kimberley, South Africa, named after him (1872). During his second term (1880-82), he upheld the policy of self-government for the Boers (1881). He was thrice secretary for India (1882-85, 1886, 1892-94), foreign secretary under Rosebery (1894-95), and successor to Grenville as Liberal Party leader in the House of Lords (1891, 1897-1902). He defended the military operations in the Boer War (1899), and was chancellor of the University of London (1899-1902).

Wodehouse, P. G. [Full name, Pelham Grenville Wodehouse.] b. Oct. 15, 1881—English writer of humorous novels. His earliest books, The Pothunters (1902), A Prefect's Uncle (1903), and Tales of St. Austin's (1903) were for younger readers. He became well known with Psmith in the City (1910), and used the same character in Psmith, Journalist (1915), and Leave it to Psmith (1923); The Inimitable Jeeves (1924), Very Good, Jeeves (1930), and The Code of the Woosters (1938) involve Bertie Wooster and his valet Jeeves; Stanley Featherstonehaugh Uckridge is the central character of Uckridge (1924) and Mr. Mulliner of Meet Mr. Mulliner (1927) and Mulliner Omnibus (1935); the inhabitants of Blandings Castle and Lord Emsworth are the leading characters of Blandings Castle (1935), Lord Emsworth and Others (1937), and Full Moon (1947). He collaborated with Guy Bolton on the musical Cabaret Girl (1922) and the play Anything Goes (1935), and was coauthor with Ian Hay of the play Leave it to Psmith (1930). Wodehouse is famous for the complex situations in which he involves his slightly "barmy" Beans and Crumpets, as he terms the inhabitants of his fictional world.

Woffington (wôf'ing.ton), Margaret. [Called Peg Woffington.] b. at Dublin, Oct. 18, c1714; d. at Teddington, Middlesex, England, March 28, 1760. Irish actress, the daughter of a bricklayer. She appeared as Polly Peacham, with a company of children, in The Beggar's Opera when only ten years old, and made her first appearance as a mature actress at Dublin in 1737 as Ophelia. Until 1740 she played a wide range of parts there. In that year she made her first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre, London, as Sylvia in The Recruiting Officer. Her success was great; her singing and the "finish" of the male characters she assumed made the fortunes of the theaters where she played, her Harry Wildair in The Constant Couple being a great favorite. She lived for some time with David Garrick and Charles Macklin, and Garrick was reported (but without foundation) to have married her. She attempted to atone for her many and notorious love affairs by her charities, though the almshouses at Teddington said to have been founded by her are actually of much earlier date. She was seized with paralysis while playing Rosalind, on May 3, 1757, and never appeared on stage again.

Wöhler (vê'lêr), Friedrich. b. at Eschersheim, near Frankfurt on the Main, Germany, July 31, 1800; d. at Göttingen, Germany, Sept. 23, 1882. German chemist. He became professor at Göttingen in 1836, and was associated with Justus von Liebig in many researches. He discovered aluminum, beryllium, and yttrium, and made many other brilliant discoveries and investigations, most notably his synthesis (1828) of urea, the first synthesis of an organic compound from inorganic material. Besides numerous special papers he wrote Grundriss der Chemie (1831), adapted J. J. Berzelius's Lehrbuch der Chemie, and edited the Annalen.

Wolcott (wul'kót), John. [Pseudonym, Peter Pindar.] b. near Kingsbridge, Devonshire, England, in May, 1738; d. at London, Jan. 14, 1819. English satirist. In early life he was a physician and was made physician general of the island of Jamaica. He returned to England and was ordained in 1760, but resumed the practice of medicine in a few years at Truro and other places. He removed to London with John Opie in 1781, and became noted for his coarse but witty satires on George III, James Boswell, and the Royal Academy. He was blind for some years before his death. Among his works are Lyrical Odes to the Royal Academicians (published first in 1782 and afterward every year till about 1814), Bozzy and Plozzi (1786), The Lousiad (1785-95), and The Apple Dumplings and a King. He painted landscapes also, and a series of his pictures was engraved by Aiken in 1797.

Wolcott (wul'kót), Oliver. b. at Windsor, Conn., Nov. 20, 1726; d. at Litchfield, Conn., Dec. 1, 1797. American politician and general; son of Roger Wolcott. He held various judicial offices in Connecticut, was a delegate to the Continental Congress from Connecticut and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and served on a number of important commissions. He commanded the Connecticut troops in 1776, and served against John Burgoyne in 1777. He was lieutenant governor (1786-96) and governor (1796-97) of Connecticut.

Wolcott, Oliver. b. at Litchfield, Conn., Jan. 11, 1760; d. at New York, June 1, 1833. American politician and financier, U.S. secretary of the treasury (1795-1800) under Washington and John Adams; son of Oliver Wolcott (1726-97). He served in the Revolutionary War, and was auditor of the treasury (1789-91) and comptroller of the treasury (1791-95). He served as governor of Connecticut (1817-27).

Wolcott, Roger. b. at Windsor, Conn., Jan. 4, 1679; d. at South Windsor, Conn., May 17, 1767. American colonial magistrate. He commanded the Connecticut contingent at the siege of Louisburg in 1745, and was governor of Connecticut (1751-54). He wrote Poetical Meditations (1725), the first poetry book published in Connecticut, and others.

Wolf (volf), Friedrich August. b. at Haynrode, near Nordhausen, Germany, Feb. 15, 1759; d. at Marseilles, France, Aug. 8, 1824. German classical scholar, regarded as the founder of scientific classical philology. He was professor at Halle (1783-1807), and later was in the government service at Berlin. His chief work is the Prolegomena ad Homerum (1795), in which he propounded the famous theory that the Iliad and Odyssey are not the work of one author (Homer), but of a number of rhapsodists.

Wolf (wulf), Henry. b. at Eckwersheim, in Alsace, Aug. 3, 1852; d. March 18, 1916. American wood-engraver. He came to New York in 1871, and later engraved numerous pictures for the American Artists Series in The Century Magazine, and also for separate publication.

Wolf (volf), Hugo. b. at Windschgraz, Austria (now Slovenjgradec, Yugoslavia), March 13, 1860; d. at Vienna, Feb. 22, 1903. Austrian composer, chiefly of songs. He lived principally at Vienna in poverty and privation, and died insane. Not till after his death did his songs, about 175 in number, become widely known. He also composed the opera Der Corregidor (1896), and left an unfinished opera, Manuel Venegas. A symphonic poem, Penthesilea, and an Italian Serenade for a small orchestra (also for a string quartet), as well as several choruses, are also among his works.

Wolfe (wulf), Charles. b. at Dublin, Dec. 14, 1791; d. at Cork, Ireland, Feb. 21, 1823. British clergyman and poet. He wrote The Burial of Sir John Moore. His Poetical Remains, with a memoir by John Russell, were published in 1825.

Wolfe, Humbert. b. at Milan, Italy, Jan. 5, 1885; d. at London, Jan. 5, 1940. English poet, critic, satirist, and translator. He also translated (1931) Edmond Fleg's Wall of Weeping and in 1934 brought out a translation of Ronsard's Sonnets for Helen.

Wolfe, James. b. at Westerham, Kent, England, Jan. 2, 1727; killed at the battle of Quebec, Canada, Sept. 13, 1759. English general. He served at Dettingen (1743), against the Scottish insurgents (1745-46), and at Lawfield (1747). He commanded a division under Jeffrey Amherst at the siege and capture of Louisburg in 1758, and was made major general and commander of the expedition against Quebec. After making unsuccessful attempts on the Marquis de Montcalm's works, he led his force up the Heights of Abraham on the night of Sept. 12, and died in the hour of victory there, Sept. 13, 1759.

Wolfe, Thomas Clayton. b. at Asheville, N.C., 1900; d. at Baltimore, Sept. 15, 1938. American writer. At the University of North Carolina he acted with and wrote for the Carolina Playmakers, and his first published work, "The Return of Buck Gavin: The Tragedy of a Mountain Outlaw" appeared in the second series of Carolina Folk Plays. From his state university he went to Harvard to study in the George Pierce Baker 47 Workshop. After a visit to Europe, he taught English at New York University (1924-30), but the success of his first novel, Look Homeward, Angel (1929), freed him from the necessity of teaching for a living. His second novel, A Portrait of Bascom Hawke, was a comparatively minor work, apart from the main stream of his creative genius; but Of Time and the River (1935) was a continuation of the story of Eugene Gant of "Altamont" in the state of "Old Catawba," who first appeared in Look Homeward, Angel, and who was easily recognized as Thomas Wolfe of Asheville in the state of North Carolina. These books, together with The Web and the Rock and You Can't Go Home Again (both edited after the author's death and posthumously published in 1939 and 1940 respectively) are clearly autobiographical, though in the last two other names substitute for Eugene Gant. An acute cerebral infection sent the novelist to the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, where he died. Wolfe was a man of phenomenal intellectual energy and of surging emotions. He was interested in all life, but especially in his own life, where he saw all the problems that make up life in general, and it has been said that he was self-fascinated and self-tormented. His life (and the lives therefore of the heroes of his principal books) was a passionate search for faith in the midst of what he conceived to be a decadent society; and, through all his scathing comments on the American social scene, he retained a poetic faith in the potentialities of the American people to achieve a better society. In this he evidenced the influence of Walt Whitman, as in his more pessimistic comment he showed the influence of Theodore Dreiser. His style, straining language to the utmost to project his passionate message, shows that he had read James Joyce, but it was a less cunning, a more tempestuous style than that of the Irish master, a style which at its height was considered by his admirers to be the greatest prose ever written in America, and indeed to be at times sheer poetry, though an adverse opinion called it "blank verse bombast and apocalyptic delirium." He was as incapable of brevity as he was of reticence, and each of his major works had to undergo major editing by his publishers to bring it down to publishable size. Wolfe's The Story of a Novel (1936) is a critical analysis of his own work. A collection of the most admired passages of his various books was published in 1939 under the title The Face of a Nation. Some of his short stories were published as From Death to Morning (1935) and Stories by Thomas Wolfe (1944); a full-length play, Mannerhouse, probably written 20 years earlier, saw print in 1948; his account of a tour in the West, A Western Journal, was published in 1951; and a collection of his letters to his mother has also been published.

Wolff, Baron Christian von. [Also, Wolff. b. at Breslau, Jan. 24, 1679; d. at Halle, Germany, April 9, 1754. German philosopher and mathematician, who started life as the son of a tanner. The influence of Gottfried Wilhelm von Leibniz's philosophy on thought and literature throughout the era of rationalism and enlightenment is in large measure due to Wolff's popularized version of it. As a professor at Halle (1706 et seq.) Wolff fought on behalf of his doctrine of philosophic reason against the Lutheran dogmatism of the Pietists who had made the university there a stronghold for their point of view. In 1721 Wolff's famous lecture, Rede von der Sittenlehre der Sineser (translated 1750 as On the Practical Philosophy of the Chinese), roused such a storm of indignation that he was dismissed and exiled on pain of death. The landgrave of Hesse thereupon received him with great honors, and Wolff held a professorship at Marburg till 1740, when Frederick the Great in one of his first acts after his accession reinstated him at Halle. Seven of Wolff's numerous works bear titles beginning Vernünftige Gedanken von . . . (Rational Thoughts on . . .) and deal with such themes as God, world, man, nature, animals, and plants.

Wolff Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations, 262 U.S. 522 (1923) (wülfl). Unanimous U.S. Supreme Court decision invalidating a Kansas law which designated certain businesses as affected with a public interest. The court's opinion, delivered by Chief Justice William H. Taft, named three categories of business as endowed with a public interest and held that a state could not arbitrarily attribute such an interest to a business. The ruling effectively narrowed state regulation of business to the realm of public monopoly.

Wolfram von Eschenbach (volf'ram fon es'h'en.bäch). d. c.1220. Middle High German poet of the latter part of the 12th century and the beginning of the 13th century; considered by many to have been the greatest epic poet of medieval Germany. He was of noble origin, and received his name from the little town of Eschenbach, near Ansbach, in Bavaria, the ancestral seat of his family. He was frequently at the court of the landgrave Hermann of Thuringia, at Eisenach. There is some question whether he could read or write, but he knew French. He made frequent references to his poverty. He was buried in the Frauenkirche at Eschenbach. He composed lyrics, among them Tagelieder; but his principal works are the epic poem Parzival, and the two uncompleted epics Titurel and Willehalm. Willehalm was derived from the French poem La Bataille d'Aliscans. Titurel was subsequently rewritten and completed by a certain Albrecht between 1260 and 1270. Willehalm was later on continued by Ulrich von Türkheim and Ulrich von dem Türlin. Wolfram's works were published by Karl Laehmann in 1833 (5th ed. in 1880).

He defeated the Egyptian insurgents under Arabi Pasha and gained the victory of Tel-el-Kebir in 1882, and was commander in chief of the unsuccessful expedition for the relief of C. G. Gordon at Khartoum (1884-85) but arrived after the town fell. He was commander in chief of the forces in Ireland in 1890, and commander in chief of the British army (1895-1900). He wrote Narrative of the War with China in 1860, System of Field Manoeuvres (1872), Marley Castle (1877), The Story of a Soldier's Life (1903), and others.

Wolsley (wul'zi), Thomas. b. at Ipswich, England, probably in 1475; d. at Leicester, England, Nov. 29, 1530. English statesman and cardinal. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, studied divinity, became rector of Lyngington in 1500, and was successively chaplain to Henry Deane, archbishop of Canterbury, to Sir Richard Nanfan, and to Henry VII. He was sent by Henry VII on a diplomatic mission to the emperor Maximilian, was made dean of Lincoln in 1509, and became, after the accession of Henry VIII, almoner in 1509 and privy counselor in 1511. He was put in charge of planning the invasion of France (1513) and accompanied the king on the expedition. In 1513 he was appointed bishop of Tournai, but was not able to possess the see; in 1514 he became bishop of Lincoln and in the same year was made archbishop of York, becoming a cardinal the next year. In 1515 also, he became lord chancellor, having become by this time the most influential person in the kingdom. Wolsley actively carried out the king's policy of the centering of power in the monarchy and was his principal instrument in foreign affairs. The struggle between the French and the Holy Roman Empire was approaching its climax and Wolsley used English power, which had brought England far up in the world since the advent of the Tudors in 1485, to maintain the balance between the two. At first England's ties were with France, but after Charles V, nephew of Henry's queen Catherine of Aragon, became emperor, Wolsley threw England's strength to Charles's side, partly because the Netherlands, England's important commercial neighbor, was in the hands of the empire. He had negotiated marriage treaties both with the French and with Charles for Mary Tudor (later Queen Mary I), Henry's eldest daughter, and the latter match seemed likely to come to actuality. However, Charles, who had agreed to military alliances with England in 1521 and 1522, avoided the decision to marry, failed to support Wolsley's candidacy for the papacy in 1521 and 1524, and, using England as a tool, secured supremacy on the Continent by defeating Francis I of France at Pavia (1525). Wolsley had borrowed heavily in England to support this unsuccessful foreign policy and its military alliances, and this, combined with his arrogance and his actually regal style of living, made him many enemies at home. When Henry decided to divorce Catherine of Aragon, Wolsley was induced to support the case and obtained from the Pope the right to a trial of the matter in England. But Cardinal Campeggio was sent to try it, superseding Wolsley, and the decision in the case, in the face of Catherine's attitude, was dragged out; appeal was made to Rome but, since Catherine was Charles V's aunt and since Charles held Italy, the Pope refused to grant the divorce. The long delay brought Wolsley the enmity of Anne Boleyn, whose influence over the king told against the cardinal, and in 1529 he was stripped of all his offices, excepting the archbishopric of York. Accused of treason, Wolsley was arrested in November, 1530, but died on his way to London.

- Wood, Edward Frederick Lindley. See Halifax, 1st Earl of.
- Wood, Fernando. b. at Philadelphia, June 14, 1812; d. at Hot Springs, Ark., Feb. 14, 1881. American politician. A New York businessman, Wood became associated with Tammany Hall and was a Democratic member of Congress from New York (1841-43). He served as mayor of New York (1855-58), but incurred the active opposition of the Republican legislature, and when Wood opposed several of their creations a state of civil hostilities was reached. He was ejected from Tammany, but in 1858 formed the rival Mozart Hall and was again elected mayor in 1859. Warning that the Union would soon be broken, and a friend of Southern democracy, Wood put forward a plan to separate New York City from the rest of the state as a parallel. At first a supporter of the Union, he later became a Peace Democrat and a collaborator with C. L. Vallandigham. Wood was again a member of Congress from New York (1863-65, 1867-81).

With Franklin Bache, he compiled The Dispensary of the United States (1833). Author of Treatise on the Practice of Medicine (1847) and Treatise on Therapeutics and Pharmacology, or Materia Medica (1856).

- Wood, Grant. b. at Anamosa, Iowa, Feb. 13, 1892; d. 1942. American painter and graphic artist, probably the most famous of the "American Scene" painters who achieved renown in the 1920's and 1930's. From the subject matter and style of medieval and early Renaissance German and Italian painters, observed on various trips to Europe, he is said to have developed his technique for portrayal of the people and scenes of Middle-Western farms and small towns. On his return from World War I he became a public-school art teacher at Cedar Rapids; he was later artist-in-residence (1935-42), University of Iowa. Wide attention was attracted by his double portrait American Gothic, which won a purchase prize (1930) at the Art Institute of Chicago. He was the painter also of Woman with Plants (1929); his mother, Victorian Survival, Dinner For Threshers, Spring in Town, the satirical Daughters of Revolution (1932), and others.

He was graduated from the Medical School of Harvard University in 1884, entered the army as lieutenant and assistant surgeon in 1886, and served in the West in the campaign against Geronimo and the Apaches in 1886. At the beginning of the war with Spain (1898) he recruited, and was appointed colonel of, the "Rough Riders" (1st U.S. volunteer cavalry). He served in the Santiago campaign, and

- was military governor of Santiago (July, 1898–December, 1899) and of Cuba (December, 1899–May, 1902), working with great success to improve sanitary conditions. He was sent to the Philippines in 1903, where he was placed in command of the department of Mindanao, served as governor of Moro province (1903–06), and was commander of the Philippines division (1906–08). He returned to the U.S. to become army chief of staff (1910–14). He served (1914 et seq.) as commander of the Department of the East, where his activities in behalf of the civilian preparedness training program irritated the Wilson administration and resulted in his failing to obtain the European command when the U.S. entered the war, Wood being a close friend of such prominent Republicans as Theodore Roosevelt. Wood became a storm center when he was refused even a subordinate command in Europe under J. J. Pershing and the controversy made him an important candidate for the Republican nomination for the presidency in 1920. After the Republicans took office, Wood was appointed governor general of the Philippines, and in that office succeeded in limiting severely the powers of the local Philippine government, taking a prominent part in blocking (1924) legislation designed to bring independence to the islands. Native unrest continued to grow until his death in 1927.
- Wood, Robert Elkington. b. at Kansas City, Mo., June 13, 1879—. American soldier and business executive. He was chaplain and professor (1890-96) at Lehigh University, and rector at Saint Stephen's Church (1896-1904) at Philadelphia and at Emmanuel Church (1904-29) at Boston. With Samuel McComb he originated (1906) the Emmanuel healing movement. Author of The Christian Religion as a Healing Power (1909), Religion and Life (1913), The Allies of Religion (1929), and Making Life Better (1933), and collaborator with Samuel McComb on Body, Mind and Spirit (1931).

Worcester, Joseph Emerson. b. at Bedford, N.H., Aug. 24, 1784; d. at Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 27, 1865. American lexicographer. He published A Geographical Dictionary, or Universal Gazetteer, Ancient and Modern (1817; revised ed., 1823), A Gazetteer of the United States (1818), Elements of Geography (1819), Sketches of the Earth and Its Inhabitants (1823), Elements of History (1826), an abridgment of Webster's dictionary (1829), A Comprehensive Pronouncing and Explanatory Dictionary (1830), and A Universal and Critical Dictionary (1846). The last, passing through several editions with little alteration, was at length revised and enlarged, and was published in quarto form as A Dictionary of the English Language (1st ed., 1860). The dictionary published by Worcester in 1830 brought a charge from Noah Webster that Worcester had plagiarized his dictionary and during the decades following a constant skirmishing was maintained between the rival publishers in the fight known as "The War of the Dictionaries." Worcester's work, which until near the close of the century remained Webster's principal rival, was far more conservative, holding to British norms, and was preferred generally by the more literate until well into the second half of the century, Webster's relying more on popular appeal.

Worcester, Noah. b. at Hollis, N.H., Nov. 25, 1758; d. at Brighton, Mass., Oct. 31, 1837. American clergyman and editor. After serving in the Revolutionary War he settled (1782) at Thornton, N.H., where he was ordained (1787) minister of the Congregational Church, holding that pulpit until 1810. He was the first editor (1813-18) of the Christian Disciple (later the Christian Examiner), a monthly Unitarian organ which he conducted at Brighton. He established and edited (1819-28) The Friend of Peace and was secretary of the Massachusetts Peace Society.

Worcester College. College of Oxford University, England, incorporated (1714) on the foundation of the Benedictine Gloucester Hall (1283).

Worcestershire (wüs'tér.shir) or Worcester (wüs'tér). Midland county in W England. It is bounded on the N by Staffordshire, on the E by Warwickshire, on the S by Gloucestershire, on the W by Herefordshire, and on the NW by Shropshire. It contains several exclaves. The surface is hilly (the Malvern and Bredon hills are on the borders), and it is traversed by the river Severn. Worcestershire is an agricultural county, noted for its vegetables, fruit, and hops (especially in the Vale of Evesham, which is sometimes called the "Garden of England"). Apples are the most important fruit raised. More than half of the total area is in permanent pasture. Coal and iron are found in the vicinity of Dudley. Industries of the county include iron and steel manufactures, glassmaking, glove-making, and porcelain manufactures. Carpets and rugs are made at Kidderminster. Worcestershire was a part of the ancient Mercia. County seat, Worcester; area, ab. 635 sq. mi.; pop. 522,974 (1951).

Worcestershire Beacon. See under Malvern Hills.

Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Peters 515 (1832) (wüs'tér; jör'ja). U.S. Supreme Court decision holding void a Georgia state law forbidding whites to reside within the Cherokee country without obtaining a license and taking an oath of allegiance to Georgia. The case arose over the arrest and conviction of several missionaries on the charge of having violated the Georgia statute. Marshall declared the judgment of the state court should be reversed and annulled. Georgia refused to obey the mandate of the Supreme Court, and the case never reached the technical phase requiring the exercise of presidential authority. There is no contemporary evidence for the remark credited to President Andrew Jackson: "John Marshall has made his decision, now let him enforce it."

Wörd (vért), Sebastian Franck of. See Franck, Sebastian.

Worde (wórd), Wynkyn de. [Original name, Jan van Wynkyn.] b. in Alsace; d. c.1535. English printer. He went to England (1476) as an assistant of William Caxton, and in 1491 became his successor. He lived in Fleet Street, London, from c.1500.

Worden (wér'den), John Lorimer. b. at Mount Pleasant, Westchester County, N.Y., March 12, 1818; d. at Washington, D.C., Oct. 18, 1897. American admiral. He entered the navy in 1835, was appointed commander in 1862, and became famous as commander of the Monitor in her battle with the Merrimack in that year. In 1863 he became captain, and commanded the Montauk in the blockading squadron. He was superintendent of the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis (1870-74).

Words upon the Window-Pane, The. One-act play (1934) by William Butler Yeats.

Wordsworth (wérdz'wérth), Charles. b. at London, Aug. 22, 1806; d. at St. Andrews, Scotland, Dec. 5, 1892. British prelate, theologian, and scholar; son of Christopher Wordsworth (1774-1846). He was bishop of St. Andrews, Dunkeld, and Dunblane (1852 et seq.). He was one of the New Testament revisers (1870-81). Author of Shakespeare's Knowledge and Use of the Bible (1864).

Wordsworth, Christopher. b. at Cockermouth, England, June 9, 1774; d. at Buxted, England, Feb. 2, 1846. English clergyman; brother of William Wordsworth. He was master of Trinity College, Cambridge (1820-41).

fát, fâte, fâr, âsk, fâre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pine; not, nôte, môve, nôr; up, lûte, pûll; ʔn, then; ð, d or j; s, s or sh; t, t or ch;

He wrote Ecclesiastical Biography (1810) and others, and supported the claims made for Charles I as the author of Eikon Basilike.

Wordsworth, Christopher. b. at Lambeth, London, Oct. 30, 1807; d. at Lincoln, England, March 21, 1885. English prelate and author; son of Christopher Wordsworth (1774-1846). He was headmaster of Harrow (1836-44) and canon of Westminster (1844 et seq.), and became bishop of Lincoln in 1868. He wrote Athens and Attica (1836), Ancient Writings Copied from the Walls of Pompeii (1837), Greece, Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical (1839), Theophilus Anglicanus (1843), On the Canon of the Scriptures (1848), Memoirs of William Wordsworth (1851), notes on the New Testament and the Bible, controversial works, and various theological and other works.

Wordsworth, Dorothy. b. at Cockermouth, Cumberland, England, Dec. 25, 1771; d. at Grasmere, Westmorland, England, Jan. 25, 1855. English writer; younger sister and constant companion of William Wordsworth. She traveled with her brother in France, Germany, Switzerland, Scotland, and the Lake District, recording her impressions in journals and diaries; her Alfoxden and Grasmere Journals (1798 et seq.), her Recollections of a Tour Made in Scotland (1803), her Journal of a Mountain Ramble describing a walking trip (November, 1805) in the Lake District, and other accounts of her travels and impressions are important because of their fine style and their value to students and biographers of Wordsworth. She also wrote a few short poems, among them Christmas Rhyme, Address to a Child, and The Cottager to her Infant, that are included in some editions of Wordsworth's Poetical Works. She never completely recovered from a severe mental and physical illness that began in April, 1829. Her Journals were published in various forms in 1874, 1889, 1897, 1904, and 1924.

Wordsworth, Dorothy. [Called Dora; married name, Mrs. Edward Quillinan.] b. at Grasmere, Westmorland, England, Aug. 6, 1804; d. there, July 9, 1847. English author; daughter of William Wordsworth. Author of A Journal of a Few Months' Residence in Portugal and Glimpses of the South of Spain (1847), dedicated to her parents.

Wordsworth, William. b. at Cockermouth, Cumberland, England, April 7, 1770; d. at Rydal Mount, Westmorland, England, April 23, 1850. English poet, poet laureate (1843-50). He was educated at Hawkshead and at Saint John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1791. He traveled on the Continent in 1790, and traveled and lived in France (1791-92), where he fell in love with Annette Vallon, the daughter of a French surgeon; a daughter, Anne Caroline, was born of the liaison in December, 1792, but Wordsworth, who had gone to England for more funds with which to live, was unable to return to France because of the outbreak of war. Wordsworth had been deeply sympathetic with the aims of the republican revolutionaries, but the war between England and France precipitated a struggle within him between his sympathy for the principles of the Revolution and his feelings of patriotism. Outwardly, at least, he was unable to show his sympathy for France and a period of despondency and pessimism ensued; he turned to the philosophy of William Godwin before experiencing a revulsion from politics that led him to a concept of the harmony of man with nature and of man's existence as a natural rather than a political being. He may have paid a brief visit to France, at the risk of his neck, in 1793 to see his daughter; he did correspond with Annette, who was later married (1816). Wordsworth received a legacy in 1795 and settled, with his sister Dorothy, at Racedown, in Dorsetshire. His friendship with Samuel Taylor Coleridge led Wordsworth to remove to Alfoxden in Somersetshire to be near him; the contact with Coleridge determined Wordsworth's career, for, under the influence of Coleridge and the writings of David Hartley, Wordsworth developed the philosophy that he expressed in his poems. In 1798 the two friends published a collection of their poems, Lyrical Ballads with a Few Other Poems, in which the revolt from the artificialities of the poetry of the day was provided with leadership in an explanatory preface and in the poems themselves and which acted as the manifesto of the Romantic poets. Wordsworth went to the Continent in 1798 and lived at Goslar, Germany, returned to England in 1799, and settled at Dove Cottage, Grasmere, in the Lake District, whence he later removed to Rydal Mount (1813). In 1802, after visiting France and making a final settlement with Annette Vallon, Wordsworth married Mary Hutchinson. During the next few years he turned vigorously against the radicalism of the day, partly as the result of the events in France where the republican excesses and the subsequent rise of Napoleon aroused in him feelings of antagonism and uneasiness concerning his own beliefs, partly as the result of his growing circle of conservative acquaintances, including Robert Southey and Walter Scott. He was appointed distributor of stamps in 1813, traveled in Scotland (1801, 1803, 1814, 1832) and the Continent (1820, 1837), but in general lived quietly and somewhat secludedly at Rydal Mount for the remainder of his life. Wordsworth's last years, which saw his appointment as poet laureate in 1843 to succeed Southey, were marked by extreme political conservatism; he opposed parliamentary reform, the secret ballot, Roman Catholic emancipation, and other liberal reforms. His works include An Evening Walk (1793), Descriptive Sketches (1792), Lyrical Ballads (1798), which includes Coleridge's The Ancient Mariner, and Wordsworth's Lines Composed a Few Miles above Tintern Abbey, Poems in Two Volumes (1807), which includes his Ode on Intimations of Immortality and a number of well-known sonnets, The Convention of Cintra (1809), a prose work on international politics, The Excursion (1814), meant to be part of a larger poetical autobiography to be entitled The Recluse, but which was never finished, a collected edition of his poems (1815), The White Doe of Rylstone (1815), Peter Bell and The Waggoner (1819), The River Duddon (1820), a group of sonnets, Ecclesiastical Sketches (1822), Memoirs of a Tour on the Continent (1822), Yarrow Revisited and Other Poems (1835), collected Sonnets (1838), The Borderers: a Tragedy (1842; written about 1796), Poems, Chiefly of Early and Late Years (1842), The Prelude (1850; finished in 1805), and others. Wordsworth's place in the forefront of the English Romantic poets is undisputed. His stated philosophical approach, to write poetry in "a selection from the real language of men in a state of vivid sensation," resulted in a number of poems notable in the revolt from the extravagances of meter and language indulged in by his predecessors and contemporaries; such poems as Tintern Abbey and Intimations of Immortality are successful blendings of clarity of language and neo-Platonic philosophy, expressed with a simplicity until then unachieved in poetry and subjected at the time to severe criticism for their "unpoetic" nature. Wordsworth failed often, for his subject matter (as in The Idiot Boy) often led him to bucolic bathos, but his successes, as in his sonnets, which rank with Milton's, place him high among English poets.

Wörgl (vèrgl). Market town in W Austria, in Tirol province, situated near the Inn River between Kufstein and Innsbruck; railroad junction. 5,641 (1946).

Work (wèrk), Henry Clay. b. at Middletown, Conn., Oct. 1, 1832; d. at Hartford, Conn., June 8, 1884. American song writer. His songs include Marching through Georgia, Nicodemus the Slave, My Grandfather's Clock, and Lily Dale.

Work, Hubert. b. July 3, 1860; d. at Denver, Colo., Dec. 14, 1942. American physician and politician, U.S. postmaster general (1922-23) under Harding and U.S. secretary of the interior (1923-28) under Harding and Coolidge. He practiced medicine in Colorado, and founded (1896) Woodcroft Hospital for Mental and Nervous Diseases.

Workers Party. Designation employed by the Communist Party of America after it emerged from its underground activities in 1921. The Workers Party, affiliated with the Comintern (Third International) at Moscow, became the Communist Party of the U.S.A. in 1929.

Workington (wèrk'ing.ton). Municipal borough, seaport, market town, and coal-mining center in NW England, in Cumberland, situated at the entrance of the river Derwent into Solway Firth, ab. 8 mi. N of Whitehaven. It has iron and steel manufactures and exports coal, mainly to Ireland. Coal is mined under the sea here. Workington was the port where Mary, Queen of Scots, entered England as the guest of Queen Elizabeth after her deposition and defeat by the Protestant lords of Scotland, in 1568. Pop. 28,882 (1951).

Workman (wérk'mán), Fanny. [Maiden name, Bullock.] b. at Worcester, Mass., Jan. 8, 1859; d. at Cannes, France, Jan. 22, 1925. American explorer and author. She married (1881) William Hunter Workman, with whom she made explorations in various parts of the globe. She was particularly noted for her ascents (1899 et seq.) in the Himalayas. Her works, written in collaboration with her husband, include Algerian Memories (1895), Sketches Awaken in Modern Iberia (1897), Ice-Bound Heights of the Mustagh (1908), Peaks and Glaciers of Nun Kun (1909), The Call of the Snowy Hissar (1910), and Two Summers in the Ice Wilds of Eastern Karakoram (1917).

Workman, Herbert Brook. b. Nov. 2, 1862—, English Wesleyan Methodist minister, educator, and church historian. He is secretary of the education committee of the Methodist Church.

Workman, William Hunter. b. at Worcester, Mass., Feb. 16, 1847; d. at Newton, Mass., Oct. 9, 1937. American physician and explorer; husband (married 1881) of Fanny Workman, who accompanied him on his travels. They explored (1897, 1898, 1899) Ceylon, Java, and India during successive winters and ascended peaks and glaciers (1899 et seq.) in the Himalayas, investigating the physiological effects of altitude, the nature and development of ice pinnacles, and types of glacier phenomena. He collaborated with his wife on a number of books.

Works and Days. Chief work of the ancient Greek poet Hesiod; so named because it deals with the labors of the farmer, and the lucky and unlucky days for performing them.

Workshop (wérk'sop, -sop). Municipal borough and market town in C England, in Nottinghamshire, situated on the river Ryton near the N extremity of Sherwood Forest, ab. 16 mi. E of Sheffield. The town has the ruins of an ancient priory founded in 1103. Pop. 31,038 (1951).

Works Progress Administration. [Called the WPA.] U.S. government agency created on May 6, 1935, for the purpose of providing emergency relief employment for jobless Americans, after experience in dropping the Civil Works Administration (November, 1933–March, 1934) showed that the unemployment problem would not be solved without federal intervention. The unemployed were set to work on public projects including the construction or improvement of national, state, and local properties, or on special projects involving research, education, theatrical productions, and music and art activities. The title of the unit was changed to the Works Projects Administration in 1939, when it was reorganized and transferred to the Federal Works Agency. The WPA was dissolved in Jan. 1943.

Worland (wér'land). Town in N Wyoming, county seat of Washlake County; trading center for an agricultural and livestock-raising area. 4,202 (1950).

World Court. See Permanent Court of International Justice.

World Economic Conference. See London Economic Conference.

World Federation of Trade Unions. [Called the WFTU.] International body composed of labor organizations from more than 40 countries and territories, including the U.S., Great Britain, the U.S.S.R., and France. It was founded at London in 1945. Voting representation by national designation is based upon the number of organized workers of member unions. The tension between Western nations and Russia led to conflict within the WFTU, and in 1949 the American Federation of Labor, which had refused to join the WFTU in 1945, reached an agreement with the Congress of Industrial Organizations to set up a new body, the International Federation of Free Trade Unions, in conjunction with other Western nation trade unions.

World Health Organization. [Called the WHO.] Subsidiary body of the United Nations Economic and Social Council established to deal with international problems of public health, disease, quarantine, pestilence, and sanitation. It draws its membership from 61 governments. Conceived at a 60-nation conference at New York in July, 1946, its charter went into force on April 7, 1948, and was ratified by the U.S. on June 21, 1948. It now has its headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland.

World I Never Made, A. Novel by James T. Farrell, published in 1936. It forms part of the Danny O'Neill tetralogy.

World Jewish Congress (jô'ish). Organization founded in 1936 at Geneva, Switzerland, by delegates from 32 countries. It is a union of Jewish groups and communities seeking a general representation to discuss and deal with questions important to world Jewry. It has been a foremost part in defending rights of Jewish groups in various countries. Its headquarters have remained in Switzerland. Among its leading figures have been Dr. Stephen Wise, Judge Julian Mack, Louis Lipsky, and Dr. Nahum Goldmann.

Worldly Wiseman (wérld'li wí'z'mán), Mr. Character in John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

World of William Clissold (wí'lyám klis'sôld), The. Novel by H. G. Wells, published in 1926.

World Peace Foundation. Institution founded in 1911 as the International School of Peace, founded by Edwin Ginn of Boston in 1909. Its object is to bring about, by education through the college, the press, the pulpit, and the platform, the peace and better order of the world. The management is vested in a board of trustees, a board of directors (corresponding to the faculty of a college), and an advisory council.

World's Columbian Exposition (kô'lum'bi'an). International exposition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the soil, mines, and sea, held at Chicago, May 1–Oct. 30, 1893, to commemorate the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus. It was participated in by the principal nations of the world, as well as by the different states of the Union, nearly all of which were represented by special buildings. The grounds covered an area of 666 acres, including Jackson Park, in the SE part of Chicago, fronting on Lake Michigan. The principal buildings were constructed of a white composition called "staff," giving the appearance of marble, which led to the adoption of the name of the "White City," by which the exposition came also to be known. The present Field Columbian Museum was formed from the Fine Arts Building. A notable feature of the exposition was a series of international congresses representing the progress of the world in science, religion, art, education, and other branches of civilization. The amusement features were collected in a strip of land, extending westward from the main grounds, called the Midway Plaisance. Awards were made by an international jury. The total attendance was 27,539,041.

World's Work. Monthly magazine, founded and edited (1900–13) by Walter Hines Page and published until 1932, when it was merged with the Review of Reviews. It emphasized America's role in international affairs.

World War I. [Also: European War, First World War, Great War.] War, beginning July 28, 1914, between Serbia and Austria-Hungary, and spreading, before the end of hostilities on Nov. 11, 1918, to include the Central Powers (principally Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey) and the Allied Powers (principally Great Britain, France, Russia, Belgium, Japan, Italy, and, later, the U.S.).

Causes and Onset of the War. The roots of World War I have been traced by some to the Treaty of Westphalia (1648) and beyond, but the direct causes were much less remote, and were, taken singly, hardly sufficient to have caused so great a conflict, one that involved countries containing more than 90 percent of the world's population. If a basic pattern can be seen in this group of incidents, it is perhaps that they were all, to a greater or lesser degree, a product of the commercial and colonial rivalry of the great powers of Europe, a rivalry incident on the growth of Germany from a coalition of comparatively minor central European states to a major imperial power in the years following the establishment of the German Empire in 1871. At about this same time occurred the final unification of Italy and the subsequent alliance (Triple Alliance) formed a strong barrier across central Europe from the North Sea down to the Mediterranean. Germany, the most powerful unit in this alliance, and a nation whose industrialization proceeded amazingly in the last decades of the century, sought to expand the area of its influence eastward and southward (Drang nach Osten) into the area occupied by the weakened Turkish Empire. Since the Russian ports on the Black Sea were useful in international commerce only so long as access to the Mediterranean through the Dardanelles was possible, it had long been part of Russian policy to see that this narrow waterway did not fall into the hands of a power which might be hostile to Russia, and it was here that German and Russian interests clashed. Moreover, France, which had been defeated by Germany in 1871 and had lost Alsace and Lorraine, was imbued to a great extent with a desire for revenge and, being on Germany's western flank as Russia was on the eastern, made a natural partner for Russia in an alliance to oppose further German expansion. The alliance between France and Russia, concluded in 1894, was augmented by an Anglo-French entente (1904) and an Anglo-Russian entente (1907), with the general effect of dividing Europe into two great opposing factions. Colonial clashes occurred regardless of the alliances (England and France, especially, being in conflict in Africa), but these disputes were smoothed over. More serious as a threat to peace was the Russian-backed pan-Slav movement in the Balkans, where the growth of nationalist sentiment among the subject peoples of the Austro-Hungarian and Turkish empires led to marked unrest. Hard on the heels of a Moroccan crisis in 1911, when France established a protectorate in Morocco in the face of determined German resistance, came a war between Turkey and Italy (1911-12) in which Italy balanced France's Moroccan accession with the seizure of Tripoli. Turkey's preoccupation with this war persuaded Bulgaria, Serbia, and Greece that the time was ripe to attack, and Balkan hostilities (First Balkan War) began even before the Italo-Turkish peace treaty was signed (October, 1912). The system of alliances now threatened a general war, Austria opposing Serbian gains in the Balkan War, Germany and Italy supporting Austria, and Russia and France supporting Serbia. The crisis passed, however, and the Second Balkan War (1913), in which Bulgaria was quickly defeated by Serbia, Greece, Rumania, and Turkey, caused almost no visible repercussions (nor, on the other hand, did it settle any basic issues). Tension still existed, and it grew with the passing of the months. Serbia and Greece were forced to give up Albania, which they had seized; Russian protests caused the removal of a German general as Turkish army commander. To balance this "sabre-rattling" were the Anglo-German agreement on the Berlin to Baghdad Railway, one of the principal factors in the German drive to the east, and the outwardly prevailing genial atmosphere which put a veneer of optimism over the now critical situation. Then, on June 28, 1914, Gavrilo Princip, a Bosnian-born Serbian nationalist and a member of the anti-Austrian Black Hand society, assassinated Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria and his wife at Sarajevo. The Austrians, fully recognizing the danger in their procedure, nevertheless built up a convincing case against Serbian complicity in this murder and issued an ultimatum, almost a month after the killings, demanding that Serbia end its support of anti-Austrian propaganda, punish certain officials allegedly involved in the plot, permit Austrian investigators to work in Serbia, and apologize to Austria; this note, sent on July 23, was explained by Austria to her allies (and to Russia as well) as being in no way aimed at absorbing Serbia. However, Serbia's reply was unsatisfactory and on July 28 Austria declared war on Serbia. Frantic efforts were made in the other European capitals to limit the war, to keep it a local conflict, to prevent its spread outside Serbia, but Russia ordered general mobilization on July 30 and the die was cast. Germany sent Russia an ultimatum (July 31) demanding that Russia stop mobilizing opposite the German frontier; on August 1 both France and Germany ordered full mobilization and, at the expiration of the 12-hour period allowed in her note to Russia, Germany declared war.

The Opening Phases. German strategy, based initially on the famous Schlieffen plan, envisaged a quick blow that would eliminate France from the war and then a full concentration eastward to destroy Russia, for there was no doubt that France would join Russia in the war and, whereas Russia's mobilization would be slow, France's would be much quicker. On August 3, therefore, Germany declared war on France and invaded Belgium as part of the plan for a wide sweep of the right wing to outflank the French forts and descend on Paris from the northwest. The invasion of Belgium, whose neutrality Germany had guaranteed in what she now termed a "scrap of paper," brought England into the war, since a powerful Germany so close across the English Channel would be a constant threat to British security, and on August 4 England declared war on Germany. The system of alliances now came into play, and before the end of the year Montenegro and Japan were in the war against the Central Powers, who had been joined by Turkey in November. Italy, although a member of the Triple Alliance, declared her neutrality on August 3; her principal rivals in the Mediterranean, Austria and Turkey, would have been her allies and Italy could therefore hope to win little or nothing, in the way of territory or anything else, by entering the conflict against the Allies. In the field, Germany quickly overran Belgium, being delayed only slightly by the necessity of reducing the great fortifications at Liège; Brussels fell on August 20, and by the beginning of September the Germans were across the French border and advancing rapidly. Soissons fell on September 1, Reims on the 3rd, and nothing seemed to stand in the way of the German advance on Paris. But changes had been made by the younger von Moltke in the original Schlieffen plan and, even before the beginning of the war, troops originally designated for the right wing had been assigned to the defense of Lorraine; in addition, late in August, several corps were sent to the Russian front and the great hammer blow on the right was to that extent weakened. Moreover, the rapid advance threatened to open a gap in the German lines of communication and supply and this slowed down and then stopped the advance west of Paris. On September 5 a French counteroffensive in the first battle of the Marne halted the German advance, and on September 9 the Germans were retiring to the north of the Aisne River, where they entrenched themselves. Allied attacks failed to dislodge them; farther east Verdun remained in the hands of the French. The German right flank now turned toward the Channel coast in an effort to gain control there before the Allies could rally, but at Ypres (Oct. 30-Nov. 24, 1914) the German "race for the sea" was halted and the line, running from Ostend to St.-Quentin, Reims, Verdun, St.-Mihiel, and Lunéville, was fixed. The war of maneuver in the west had stopped after a little more than three months and the fighting settled down to the four long years of trench warfare that lay ahead. In the east, German successes at Tannenberg (August 26-30) and the Masurian Lakes (September 6-15) had smashed the Russian army attempting to invade East Prussia, but the Austrians to the south had been forced back far into Galicia. German offensives attempting to relieve pressure on the Austrians failed in this primary objective and Russia remained in possession of a large section of Polish and Hungarian territory, their westernmost units reaching almost to Kraków, where a battle was fought in November.

The Western Front 1915-16. The end of the war of maneuver left the German and Franco-British armies facing each other along a front extending from Switzerland to the English Channel. Both sides believed that a decision, if it were to be reached, would result from a victory on the Champagne front in France rather than along the eastern or western ends of the line, and their strategies were based on this assumption. Trench warfare made operations fantastically costly in terms of men, and huge numbers of casualties resulted from attempts to break through the opposing lines in attacks that meant going "over the top" in the face of concentrated machine-gun and rifle fire, advancing through mud churned up by artillery barrages (first developed in this phase of the war as a tactical device to clear trenches of opposing effectives and to prevent reinforcement), thus gaining a few yards at prohibitive cost in terms of an extended offensive. At the second battle of Ypres (April, 1915) the Germans introduced poison gas (chlorine) to open a great gap in the British lines, but they failed to advance (partly because they doubted the efficacy of the new weapon). Another new arm of warfare, the airplane, came into use as an aid to observation of troop movements and of the accuracy of cannon fire; the captive balloon was also used for observation, the dirigible balloon or Zeppelin was used on bombing raids across the Channel, and the large bombing airplane was used to a limited extent. During the battle of the Somme in 1916 the British put into action the first tanks, which were simply armored gun carriages on tractor bases. In the main, 1915 was marked by huge assaults and inconsequential results: Ypres (April-May), Artois (May-June), Champagne (September-November), again Artois (September-October), but in February, 1916, the Germans mounted a huge offensive against Verdun that threatened to wipe out the French salient and break the line connecting the eastern and western wings of the armies. It was here, under Pétain, that the French rallying cry became famous: "Ils ne passeront pas" ("They shall not pass"); by the middle of July, after five months of hammering at the French positions, the Germans, who had taken a few of the forts around the city, ended their attack. The French defense of Verdun took some of the edge from the Allied offensive on the Somme that opened on July 1; this struggle, which advanced the Allied line a maximum of seven miles along a front of some 15 miles, cost both sides more than a million men before it died out in November. French attacks retook the positions around Verdun and, after two years of fighting, neither side had gained appreciably in territory, while both were on the point of exhaustion as a result of the punishment absorbed by their military machines.

The Eastern Front 1915-17. The Russian drive toward the Carpathians and Hungary was the principal determining factor in the fighting on the Eastern Front. German counterattacks to the north were aimed principally at relieving the pressure of the Russians on the Austrian armies, but despite additional German successes around the Masurian Lakes (February, 1915) and the capture of Memel (March, 1915) the Russians continued to threaten a breakthrough. Late in March, with the fall of Przemyśl, the situation became critical, and a combined offensive by the Germans and Austrians in April and May was required to throw the Russians back; but once the retreat started the Russian army seemed to fall apart and by the beginning of July Galicia, Bucovina, and Courland were in the hands of the Central Powers. In July another large-scale attack was begun, which by September had overrun Poland and Lithuania. In June, 1916, the Russians counterattacked along the front from the Carpathians to the Baltic and were in the main successful, though they failed to take their principal objectives. Their losses again, as in the earlier fighting, were tremendous and, although their position was fairly good in a strictly tactical sense, the morale of the army was bad and worsening daily. The entry of Rumania into the war (August, 1916) during the early success of the great Russian offensive was calculated to divert forces from the more northerly fighting, but the Germans, Austrians, and Bulgarians quickly overran that country and by January, 1917, Rumania was out of the war for all practical purposes. The situation within Russia had become almost impossible, with the czar at the front and the government being run by a palace clique under the thumb of the monk Rasputin; in March, 1917, the czar abdicated in favor of a moderate government and strenuous efforts were made by the Allies to keep Russia in the war. The new government, under Kerensky, was in favor of continuing and another offensive was begun in Galicia in July, but a German counterattack quickly canceled all gains and continued to roll on, the Germans taking Riga in September. At this point, with the Kerensky government tottering and the country in a state bordering on anarchy, L. G. Kornilov (who had recently been appointed commander of the Russian forces) fell out with the government, marched on Petrograd in an attempt at a coup d'état, and was arrested. The Russian effort was ended: the Germans quickly took Latvia and the Baltic islands and, after the Bolsheviks seized power (November, 1917), an armistice was arranged. During the negotiations that followed fighting once again broke out, but on March 3, 1918, the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, stripping Russia of the Ukraine, Poland, Lithuania, Finland, the Baltic provinces, and the Armenian area, was signed by the Bolshevik government.

The Italian Front 1915-18. The refusal of Italy to enter the war on the side of the German-Austrian alliance led during the year following to a series of diplomatic maneuvers, with Germany gradually convincing Austria that Italy should be rewarded with Austrian-controlled territory (Trentino, Gorizia, parts of Albania, and other places) for her adherence to the Triple Alliance. In the meanwhile, the Allies had not been idle and in April, 1915, France, England, and Russia concluded with Italy the secret Treaty of London, granting to Italy her claims to Austrian territory, far more than Austria would have allowed, and also giving Italy a share in the expected division of German colonies at the end of the war. As a result, Italy declared war on Austria-Hungary (May 23, 1915) and soon began attacks along the Isonzo in the direction of Trieste. These attacks continued through 1916 despite Austrian attempts at diversion, and even as late as September, 1917, the Italians were still trying to break through on the Isonzo to Trieste. However, in October, 1917, a combined German-Austrian attack at Caporetto cracked the Italian line and sent the Italians streaming back to the Piave, when the advance was forced to stop because it was outrunning its supplies. In June, 1918, the Austrians attempted an offensive on the Piave, crossed the river successfully, and then were thrown back; this, combined with the general collapse of the Austrian war effort, made the general offensive of the Italians (October 24 et seq.) a success that took Vittorio Veneto (October 30), Trieste (November 3), and Fiume (November 5), by which time Austria was out of the war, an armistice having been signed on November 3.

The Turkish and Balkan Fronts 1914-18. Turkey, the rival of Russia for control of many areas in the Middle East, naturally adhered to the Central Powers. Observing a pro-German neutrality at first, the Turkish Empire entered the war suddenly on Oct. 29, 1914, when her fleet bombarded Odessa and other Black Sea ports of the Russians. The week following saw her fully in the war against the Allies. Late in 1914 and early in 1915 the Turks engaged in an offensive against the Russians in Caucasus, the principal result of which was the decision of the Allies to mount an attack against the Dardanelles. However, divided counsels among the Allies kept the striking force to a minimum and immediate successes in February could not be followed up. Further landings were made in April and August, but by that time the Turks had reinforced their positions and the entire Gallipoli campaign collapsed; by January the Allies had evacuated their forces. Throughout 1915 and 1916 fighting occurred in Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Persia between the Allied and Turkish forces, the British being especially careful to maintain large contingents in Egypt to protect the Suez Canal. These campaigns were paralleled by noteworthy British diplomacy, which succeeded in enlisting the aid of the Arabs against the Turks in return for promises of territory. The result became evident late in 1917 when a British offensive in Palestine was able to take Gaza, Jaffa, and Jerusalem (December 9). In the fall of 1918 another attack routed the Turks at Megiddo and the reverses here, combined with defeats in Syria and the failure of the Central Powers in the Balkans took Turkey out of the war on Oct. 30, 1918. In the Balkans, where claims and counterclaims to territory had the Allies and Central Powers outbidding each other in return for promises of support, Bulgaria entered the war in October, 1915, after British and French forces had landed at Salonika and the Germans had attacked Serbia. Bulgaria hastened to join in the attack on Serbia and helped to secure the country, with the result that she found herself at war with the Allies. In 1918 the British and French troops stationed at Salonika, aided by Italians, Greeks, and Serbs, attacked Bulgaria, and in a week of fighting so whipped the Bulgars that they asked for an armistice, signed September 30. Greece, vacillating between the pro-German policy of King Constantine and the pro-Allied policy of Eleutherios Venizelos, seemed about to enter the war a number of times, first in support of Serbia, whose ally she was, then in support of Bulgaria; Greece suffered invasion at Salonika by the Allies (1915) and blockade by the Allies (1916) and, at last, after the abdication of the king, entered the war on the side of the Allies (June 27, 1917).

The War at Sea 1914-18. Under William II, Germany had built a navy that for the first time in centuries challenged England's mastery of the seas. The outbreak of the war found many of its ships at sea, where they engaged in raiding commerce and disrupting communications lines. Several spirited engagements were fought in 1914 in the South Atlantic between small squadrons of the fleets, and in 1915 the cruiser squadrons met briefly off Dogger Bank. On May 31-June 1, 1916, major elements of the two fleets fought one of the great battles of naval history; the meeting occurred in the Skagerrak off Jutland. British losses in tonnage were far greater than those of the Germans, but the fighting was broken off by the German fleet, which retired to its base and did not again come forth during the war. It was not with the traditional fleet units, however, that Germany fought her most effective battles at sea. A continental power, with excellent internal lines of communication, she developed a most effective weapon against the extended sea routes of Great Britain. This weapon, the submarine, was most useful in surprise attacks or against unarmed vessels, since it was vulnerable in any prolonged or surface fighting to even the smallest warships; one result of its success was a strong Allied propaganda campaign against this "inhuman" weapon. The German submarine blockade of Great Britain was countered by Allied efforts to restrict shipments of an expanding list of contraband articles to Europe, with the result that very early in the war the principal neutral power, the U.S., became engaged diplomatically, sending notes of protest both to Germany and to Great Britain. The sinking of the British ship Lusitania (May 7, 1915), coming only a short time after the German use of poison gas at Ypres, seems to have tipped the scales in America in favor of the Allies, although there existed a wide desire to stay out of the war. Strong American representations after the Lusitania incident caused suspension by Germany of her policy of unlimited attacks on shipping, but unrestricted submarine warfare was announced by Germany on Feb. 1, 1917, and an immediate consequence was a break in diplomatic relations between Germany and the U.S.

American Entry into the War; The Western Front 1917-18. In the U.S., where Woodrow Wilson had been reelected in 1916 on the slogan "He kept us out of war," there was a strong desire to keep out of a conflict based essentially on commercial rivalries, but in the two years between the Lusitania's sinking and the American declaration of war American sympathies gradually turned toward the Allies and away from Germany. Wilson had in 1916 made an effort to mediate the war through diplomatic channels and had obtained some response from both sides, but his public "peace without victory" speech in January, 1917, was followed by a reopening of unrestricted submarine warfare and the negotiations fell through. By April, 1917, the U.S. was ready to enter the war and, on April 6, Congress voted war against Germany. American help through troops ended the battlefield was not to be felt until a year had passed, but the addition to the Allied side of the principal power in the Western Hemisphere was enormously important from the standpoint of morale. Germany now hoped to end the war before the American potential could make itself felt; the Allies now had time on their side. The fighting on the Western Front had continued the stalemate through 1917; the Germans early in the year had fallen back to the strong Hindenburg line, though it meant giving up some territory; the Allies essayed several offensives (Arras in April-May; the Aisne in April; Messines in June; Ypres from July to November; Verdun in August; Cambrai in November) but with only insignificant results except for immediate tactical successes and further slaughter of men. In March, 1918, however, the German command opened a huge attack in Champagne that broke through the Allied lines at St.-Quentin; this was followed by another successful assault in April near Ypres and a smashing blow on the Aisne (May-June) that brought the Germans to within 40 miles of Paris. But by this time American troops were in action, at Château-Thierry in June, on the Marne in July and August, and at St.-Mihiel in September. When the German attacks were stopped with a counteroffensive on the Marne in early August, the stalemate was over. A series of Allied attacks, beginning at Amiens and continuing through the Somme and Arras (August), the Argonne (September-October), and then all along the line from the coast to Metz, pushed the Germans back steadily. In late September the military reverses caused the fall of the Berlin government, and appeals for peace on the basis of Wilson's Fourteen Points were made by the government of Prince Max of Baden in October; but the time was too short for Germany to bargain and early in November, following a mutiny in the German fleet and revolutionary activity in Bavaria and Prussia, Kaiser William II fled to the Netherlands, a republic was proclaimed, and an armistice became effective (Nov. 11, 1918).

The Aftermath. More than ten million people died in the war, which was by far the costliest the world had known up to that time, and great areas of Europe, especially in the northern parts of France where the heaviest fighting had taken place, were devastated. One of the principal aims of the French was to obtain compensation for this damage; also, they wanted to insure against any recurrence of German aggression by destroying the military potential of the country that had twice within 50 years invaded her territory. The Treaty of Versailles, therefore, included a clause in which Germany admitted guilt for causing the war and it detailed the reparations Germany was to pay; it limited German military strength, established a demilitarized zone on the Franco-German frontier, and took from Germany certain strategic areas. Despite the specific strictures in the Fourteen Points against secret treaties, the subversion of minorities in larger countries, and territorial aggrandizement, the Versailles Treaty and the treaties signed with the other Central Powers (St.-Germain with Austria, Neuilly with Bulgaria, Trianon with Hungary, Sèvres and Lausanne with Turkey), the losers were heavily penalized in territory and in population (though it has been pointed out that none of the treaties was nearly as harsh as the Brest-Litovsk treaty forced by Germany from the Bolshevik government of Russia, a treaty canceled with the German defeat). Germany lost all its colonies; Alsace and Lorraine went to France, several areas went to Belgium, Posen and parts of Prussia became Polish (the Polish Corridor between Germany and East Prussia, intended to give Poland an outlet to the sea while preserving to some extent the ethnic boundaries of the region, was a geographic absurdity, but typifies the extent of the compromises sought between the ideal and the real in the treaties); Danzig, the Saar, Memel, Schleswig, and Silesia were all either established independently or made plebiscite areas; the Austro-Hungarian Empire was broken up and in its place were established the succession states: an economically feeble Austria, a Hungary shorn of much of its rich land, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Poland. Italy obtained much of the territory she was promised by the Treaty of London; Rumania gained great areas from the old Austro-Hungarian Empire; Turkey in Europe all but disappeared, and much of Turkey's eastern area was taken from her, as were Syria and the Arab territories, and this despite the revision of the treaty forced by the Turks from the Allies. The treaties, in many ways a series of compromises between the genuine idealism of Wilson and the blunt realism of Georges Clemenceau, left central Europe a conglomeration of small states, still with their minority problems, ripe to fall into the grasp of any determined effort by one of the more powerful countries to establish a Continental hegemony.

World War II. [Also, Second World War.] War, beginning Sept. 1, 1939, when Germany invaded Poland, and continuing in Europe until Germany's surrender in May, 1945, and in the Pacific area until Sept. 2, 1945, when Japan surrendered; the principal combatants on the side that came to be known as the United Nations were the United Kingdom and the British Commonwealth, France, the U.S.S.R., China, and the U.S.; their opponents, known generally as the Axis nations, included principally Germany, Italy, and Japan.

Causes and Onset of the War. The Munich crisis of September, 1938, was the sign to many that war could not be much longer averted. The appeasement of Hitler at that time by Great Britain and France led to the destruction of Czechoslovakia (the Sudetenland was given up immediately; the country itself disappeared in the following March), wrecked the system of small-state alliances that had been built up during the preceding decade, cut France off from her alliances with these states, and left Germany, which six years before had been a weak remnant of the Germany defeated in World War I, in the preëminent position in Europe. A telling cause of the surrender to German demands was the almost total unpreparedness of the western European powers in the face of a Germany widely reported to have a magnificent air force and a well-trained army. But the annihilation of Czechoslovakia in March, 1939, adding the protectorate of Bohemia-Moravia to a Germany already swollen by the absorption of Austria a year before, was followed by the taking of Memel and increased pressure by the German minority in Danzig for annexation of that city and strong indications to Poland that the touchy question of the Polish Corridor, a strip of land dividing Germany into two parts, would soon have to be settled. England, however, had had enough of Hitler's tactics, and the British, joined by the French, agreed to come to Poland's aid if she were attacked by Germany. Further ties were made with Turkey, and an attempt at an agreement was made with Russia. In April, 1939, Italy, the other partner in the Rome-Berlin axis, continuing the aggressive policy followed (1935-36) in Ethiopia, invaded and absorbed Albania, thus adding to the international tension. The seething mixture came to a boil when, during a sharp rise in the pressure for annexation of Danzig to Germany, Russia and Germany signed a nonaggression treaty; England and France, which had been trying vainly for months to overcome Russian suspicions (due in part to the exclusion of Russia from the Munich conference, in part to the long series of incidents resulting from opposition in the West to the Bolshevik government, and aggravated by Poland's flat refusal, during the talks designed to set up a military system to aid her, to permit Russian troops to cross Polish soil even if the enemy were Germany), had suffered a major defeat and Hitler's hands were loosed for war in the west. The Russo-German pact was signed on August 23; on September 1 German planes bombed Poland and a few hours afterward German troops were crossing the Polish border.

To the Fall of France. Poland was quickly crushed by a mechanized, thoroughly modern army that outnumbered her own forces by three to one; the German military machine took Warsaw on September 27, ten days after Russia invaded Poland from the east. Russia and Germany divided the country between them (Germany including Danzig in her share). The Baltic republics (Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania), thus cut off from any possible help, quickly signed treaties permitting Russian defense measures on their territory; in the following year these countries "voluntarily" became republics of the U.S.S.R. (a fact not recognized then or since by the U.S. government). Russia, apparently in haste to build a buffer area to protect herself from the German war machine, late in November demanded certain defense rights on Finnish territory and also the cession of certain territories, notably an area in front of Leningrad. Finland refused, and Russia at once began a series of attacks, beginning Nov. 30, 1939, that grew in intensity from advances in light strength to heavy attacks and resulted in Finland's capitulation in March, 1940; Russia then took the defensive areas she had demanded earlier. On the Western Front military operations were at a standstill, the defenses erected by the Germans impeding French attacks, the French Maginot Line similarly threatening to contain any German offensive. Action was limited to scouting forays and probing attacks, and the period came to be known as the "Phony War," since neither side seemed willing to risk its forces in an attack on what were heralded as impenetrable defensive positions. The opinion of many people was that with the fall of Poland the reason for the war had disappeared and that after a few face-saving maneuvers peace would be agreed upon. But with the passing of the first winter of the war it became obvious that both sides were planning to break the stalemate in the west. Norway's long coastline was a strategic prize: from it German planes and submarines could stage forays against convoys bringing supplies to England; the British not only needed to control this area as a defensive measure, but they were conducting a campaign to bring the neutral countries into the war against Germany. It became a question of who would move first, and on April 9 Norway and Denmark were invaded by the Germans. Denmark was able to offer no resistance; Norway, supported by British troops and ships, fought back, but by June organized Norwegian military efforts were ended. On May 10, 1940, the Germans, who had been building up their forces in the west, suddenly struck against France. The Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg were invaded, and resistance was easily brushed aside by the German armored divisions. Once through Luxembourg, the Germans took Sedan, and the way across France was open. The huge Belgian fort of Eben Emael near Liège was quickly reduced by airborne troops; with this key to their defense knocked out, the Belgians fell back and, on May 28, surrendered. In the Netherlands, the German victory was even quicker; Rotterdam fell on May 14, and the next day the Dutch army gave up the fight. Meanwhile the Germans were advancing with surprising ease into France; tanks, mechanized troops, coordinated air attacks broke through the French resistance. What seemed at first to be a tactically reducible salient pushed into the Somme valley, but suddenly it became a wide corridor, between the British and Belgian and the French armies, down which poured a great mass of men and machines. The German attack, actually up to this time a straight but enormously powerful jab rather than the well-publicized right hook of the famous Schlieffen plan, rolled on to the Channel coast; the British, isolated by this wedge and the fall of Belgium, were forced to the sea. But then, in one of the great episodes of the war, the British rallied all their resources; abandoning matériel, they concentrated on removing their expeditionary force from the beaches at and near Dunkerque; local air superiority was gained by concentration of force; ships and boats were shuttled back and forth across the Channel, and by June 4 between 300,000 and 350,000 Allied troops (two thirds British, the remainder principally French) had been evacuated. The cost in equipment was enormous, and England was left with an unarmed army; but morale, which had dropped steadily with the fall of England's allies, rose to new heights. The Germans, having reached the coast, now turned south; on June 5, they began advancing across the width of France. Paris fell on June 14, Verdun was lost on the 15th, and it became clear that further resistance was impossible. On June 17, Henri Philippe Pétain, the World War I hero of Verdun, who had become chief of state the day before, asked for an armistice. The Germans continued to advance while terms were being arranged and, when the armistice was signed June 22 at Compiègne in the same railroad car in which the Germans had signed in 1918, the invaders were as far south as the line Lorient-Vichy-Lyons and preparing to join up with Italian forces, which had invaded southern France when Italy declared war on June 10. The Germans occupied northern France; the southern two-fifths of the country remained in French hands and was governed from Vichy by the Pétain government. The French did not completely surrender; resistance forces, the French Forces of the Interior (FFI), the Maquis, and guerrilla bands kept up a constant harassment of the Germans throughout the period of occupation, and a Free French government, headed by General Charles de Gaulle, was established at London and in the French colonies seized from Vichy France (notably at Brazzaville, in French Equatorial Africa). An effort by the British to secure units of the French fleet based at Oran in Algeria failed when the crews fought back, and the British sank a major part of the French fleet in the harbor of Oran on July 3; most of the remainder of the fleet was scuttled at Toulon in November, 1942, when the Germans occupied the rest of France and tried to seize the fleet.

The Battle of Britain. England was now left alone to face the threat of a Continent completely dominated by one power. It is probable that Hitler expected a "sensible" peace to be arranged with England, which had no forces on the mainland and at home an army depleted by the reverses in France and almost unequipped after Dunkerque. But the British were now led by Winston S. Churchill, a very different sort of leader from Neville Chamberlain. Churchill, who had become prime minister when the Germans invaded the Low Countries, told his people he had "nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears, and sweat" but that England would "fight on beaches . . . on landing grounds . . . in fields, streets, and hills. We shall never surrender and even if . . . this island . . . is subjugated and starving, then our empire . . . will carry on the struggle." Whether Hitler thought that these words were the preliminaries to an attempt at peace or whether he felt that a sea and air blockade would force the British to submit, he failed to prepare anything but a hasty and quickly abandoned invasion fleet and thus literally left an island of resistance on his flank that prevented him from ending the war in June or July, 1940. Instead, Germany embarked on a campaign of bombing England into submission. In August, September, and October huge air fleets, of as many as 1,000 planes at a time, ranged over England, causing huge losses in property and thousands of casualties. The air attack rose to its height in November when Coventry was all but bombed out of existence, but after that final effort the mass raids on England fell off. Britain's defenses, strengthened by the new invention of radar, and based on a comparatively small fleet of fighter planes, had made the cost to the Germans prohibitive: three German planes were shot down for every British loss, and, more serious, the German losses were usually of trained bomber crews of four to six men while British losses were limited to single fighter pilots, who were often rescued from their planes. Thus the Battle of Britain slowed down, although air raids continued for most of the rest of the war. German preoccupation with Russia after the summer of 1941 reduced the raids to a minimum, and after the Allied invasion of the Continent in 1944 the raiding bombers were superseded by robot bombs and rockets. These great air raids, which had been predicted by military writers in the period between the wars, were aimed not only at such military installations as airfields and industrial plants but also at the civilian populations, for this war was fought not simply between armies in the field but by whole nations whose warriors were only technically civilians and who turned out the machines and supplies with which the war was prosecuted. The traditional conception of warfare consisting principally of seizing and holding territory tended to become modified as the years went by; with modern industrialization and communications, lines of supply were less easily attacked than actual sources of supply and, since factories were manned by civilians, the line drawn between civilian and military targets tended to disappear, and indiscriminate bombing and fire raids against industrial cities became a normal military operation. Britain retaliated on Europe, bombing first the possible invasion ports, the submarine bases, and the cities that were immediate threats in military operations. Then as the flow of supplies from America grew and as the Germans became more deeply involved in operations in eastern and southern Europe, British raids on Germany itself grew in intensity. The great 1,000-plane raid on Cologne (May 30-31, 1942) was followed by heavy strikes at Essen, Bremen, and other centers; with the arrival of the U.S. air force, round-the-clock bombing of Germany, the British at night, the Americans during the day, was instituted. Before the end of the war such cities as those in the Rhineland, Bremen, Hamburg, Berlin, were in ruins. Far more than any other development of World War II, the war in the air was an innovation revolutionizing the strategical and tactical concepts of warfare.

The War in the Balkans. Control of the Mediterranean and its surrounding lands was a natural military aim of the Axis powers, since the communications line of the British Empire passed through the sea from Gibraltar to Suez. First attacks in the area, however, were made against Rumania, whose valuable oil fields were a prime objective. In June, 1940, Russia seized Bessarabia and part of Bucovina (another buffer area along her borders); in August, Hungary detached a large area in the west; in September, Bulgaria took southern Dobruja; and finally, in October, German troops took over the remainder of the country as a "protective" measure. Late in October, Italian troops marched into Greece from Albania, but backed by some British troops the Greeks fought back successfully until, in April, 1941, the Germans sent their own armies into the fight and snuffed out resistance; an airborne German campaign against Crete, the first really large-scale test of parachute troops, drove the remaining British defenders of the Greek area to Cyprus. Simultaneously with the invasion of Greece, German troops marched into Yugoslavia (April 6, 1941) and forced the capitulation of the government within a week, but here the Germans faced opposition for the rest of the war (as they did in France, Greece, and some other areas) from well-organized guerrilla fighters. The underground fighting in Yugoslavia was complicated by the internal rivalry between the Serbs and Croats, and forces under Draja Mihailovich and Tito, a Communist leader, but eventually Allied support of Tito's partisans gave them the upper hand and enabled them to concentrate entirely on the German occupation forces. Aside from Gibraltar, which was more or less neutralized as a base because of the pro-Axis tendency of Spain, and Cyprus, at the far end of the Mediterranean protecting the Syrian coast, all of the Mediterranean north of Africa and west of Turkey except for Malta was in Axis hands, and the African coast as far as Egypt was either French, Spanish, or Italian; the British line of supply was forced to make the long voyage around Africa. Some of the principal sea fights of the war occurred in the Mediterranean; in November, 1940, a large part of the Italian fleet was destroyed at Taranto by planes; in March, 1941, a number of Italian warships were sent to the bottom off Cape Matapan by units of the British fleet; on the whole, however, neither in the Mediterranean nor elsewhere were there concentrated fleet actions, like that of Jutland in World War I, but rather squadron actions or plane vs. ship battles.

From the Attack on Russia to Pearl Harbor. During the Balkan campaigns there were signs that Russian and German interests were clashing to the point of an open break and, despite the traditional opposition of German staff officers to a two-front war, Hitler's armies suddenly attacked the U.S.S.R. on June 22, 1941, advancing on a front from Finland to Rumania. The initial advance was rapid; by August most of the Ukraine was in German hands; Leningrad was besieged early in September; Moscow was under siege by October, in which month the Crimea was also nearly overrun. Kerch fell on November 16, but Sevastopol held out until July of the following year. In the fight for Russia there were few battles of the old-fashioned kind; resistance was constant, advances were made by steady pressure, wide encircling sweeps were made against Russian troops who slipped through the ring to fight again as new sweeps were made. Fighting was more intense around populated places and rose to battle pitch near such cities as Taganrog and Kharkov, but the fighting consisted primarily of open maneuvering by mechanized forces and advances in the face of stiff and debilitating resistance. Early in December, winter having come to bog down the troop-carrying trucks and the heavy tanks, the Germans halted their offensive. The German army was not equipped for a heavy winter campaign, for Hitler had expected the capture of Leningrad and Moscow during the autumn; that the two cities still were in the hands of the Russians was due in part to the wide buffer areas built up by the Russians, which had added some hundreds of miles to the German lines of communication and slowed their advance. Germany was not permitted, however, to dig into winter quarters; the Russians immediately began a counteroffensive that lasted into the spring and regained much territory. In December, 1941, the war, which until then had been limited largely to the European continent, exploded into a world-wide conflict; on Sunday, Dec. 7, 1941, carrier-based Japanese planes bombed the American base at Pearl Harbor in Hawaii and destroyed much of the American active fleet.

The War in the Pacific and Asia to Okinawa. The U.S., traditionally aloof from European quarrels and disillusioned as the result of its participation in World War I, had been, in the years since 1937, becoming slowly aware of America's stake in the international struggle. Despite strong isolationist sentiment, as expressed in such legislation as the Neutrality Act and in the public speeches of statesmen like William Borah and persons with expert knowledge like Charles A. Lindbergh (one of those who warned of Germany's air might), the nation gradually was brought, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, to a position where it was prepared to assert its role in events occurring outside its borders but affecting its interests. The neutrality legislation was amended, in England's favor, to permit cash-and-carry buying of arms, a hemisphere network of defense was arranged with Canada and Latin America, and the country's own defenses were strengthened. In September, 1940, after the fall of France, the U.S. turned over to Britain a number of overage but vitally needed destroyers in exchange for long-term leases of naval and air bases in British possessions in the Caribbean area. The U.S. began to work toward full two-ocean fleet strength, a great program of airplane building was begun, and, in September, 1940, the first peacetime draft in U.S. history was enacted by Congress. In 1941, both Greenland and Iceland were occupied by American troops and the first incidents involving U.S. warships on patrol duty in the Atlantic were reported, the destroyer Reuben James being sunk in October. While America's attention was primarily focused on the European war, a wary eye was being kept on the Pacific. In Asia, Japan had, since 1931, been building an empire, despite the disapproval of the League of Nations, which she later consolidated with her other conquests in the so-called Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. Manchuria had been detached from China and established as the puppet state of Manchukuo in 1932, and in 1937 Japan had, without declaring war, invaded China itself; the fighting continued as the European war began, China slowly being conquered. The vacuum in the Far East caused by the collapse of the home centers of the colonial governments gave Japan an unparalleled opportunity to expand its empire; in 1940 she occupied Indochina with Vichy France's tacit approval, and for a time exerted sufficient pressure to force Great Britain to close the Burma Road, by which supplies had been reaching China. In 1940, however, Japan became a full member of the Axis, and it became obvious that these three major "have-not" nations were linked in the world-wide effort to wrest territories from the "have" nations by force. Diplomatic conversations were maintained by the Japanese even past the time of the Pearl Harbor attack, and these talks served to smoke-screen Japan's well-planned attack throughout the Pacific. Three days after the Pearl Harbor disaster, in which five U.S. battleships and a number of smaller ships were destroyed and three battleships severely damaged, the British battleships Prince of Wales and Repulse were caught in the open sea by Japanese bombers and sunk; Guam was attacked and surrendered on December 13, Wake Island gave up after a heroic defense on December 23. Burma, the Philippines, Hong Kong, Malaya and Singapore, the Netherlands East Indies, and parts of New Guinea were attacked and taken. A small U.S. force held out on Corregidor in the Philippines until May, soon after the end of resistance in Bataan, but before that time Douglas MacArthur had been evacuated to Australia to become supreme Allied commander in the southwest Pacific. At the end of February a number of the ships of the Allies were sunk in the Java Sea, thus effectively limiting the resistance of the Allies in the eastern Pacific. But in May a Japanese fleet was caught in the Coral Sea off the Solomons and terribly mauled, and early in June a huge naval force was broken up and smashed by American planes in the battle of Midway. North America was invaded in June, when Japan took Attu in the Aleutians, but this was the peak of the Japanese tide. American forces were building up rapidly in the areas east of the Solomons, north and east of Australia, where the Japanese had established themselves, and on Aug. 7, 1942, eight months after the U.S. was precipitated into the war, American marines landed in the Solomons in the beginning of the counterattack. Thereafter a bitter struggle ensued in the jungles of the South Pacific islands and on the beaches of sandy atolls as the American forces, supported by British Commonwealth troops, fought back island by island through the vast area, with a radius in some places of more than 3,000 miles from Japan, taken by the Japanese in the first six months of the war. The Gilberts (November, 1943), the Marshalls (January, 1944), the Marianas (June, 1944), the Carolines (September, 1944) were attacked and taken in a series of memorable campaigns in which new techniques of air, sea, and land force cooperation were exploited; Guadalcanal, Bougainville, and Choiseul in the Solomons, Tarawa and Makin in the Gilberts, Kwajalein and Eniwetok in the Marshalls, Saipan in the Marianas, Palau, Truk, and Yap in the Carolines became familiar names, a number of these islands being the scene of some of the most difficult fighting ever engaged in by American troops. In October, 1944, the Americans had returned to the Philippines, landings being made at Leyte on October 19, and the fiercest naval battle of World War II was fought in the Philippine Sea (October 22-27) when 40 Japanese ships were sunk. Early in the war (April 18, 1942), a number of army bombers had taken off from the carrier Hornet (or Shangri-la, as President Roosevelt jocularly called it) to carry out an audacious bombing raid on Tokyo, but now, with the improvements in airplane range, U.S. planes based in the Marianas were in striking range of the Japanese islands, and bombing raids were constant thereafter. In February, 1945, landings were made at Iwo Jima, almost within the Japanese home islands, and after a bitter struggle in the island's volcanic dust the Japanese were defeated. The great battle for Okinawa in the Ryukyus began in March, 1945, and though the Japanese fought desperately, until more than 80 percent of their men were casualties, on June 21 the island was in the hands of the Americans. On the Asian continent, Japan kept the initiative throughout 1942 and 1943, in both China and Burma; the Burma Road had been taken in 1942 and a large part of the supplies sent to the embattled nation went by air over the high mountains between India and China. In 1944, the Allies were able to begin a campaign in Burma to clear the way for a supply road from Leda in India northward to China, and this offensive marked the first successes for the Allies in the area. Chinese and American troops laboriously opened the road to Myitkyina, the communications center finally being freed, after months of fighting, in August, while a Japanese counteroffensive at Imphal threatened to close the Leda route, before it was opened, from the rear. However, by December, 1944, the Japanese were in full retreat in Burma and by the end of January the Leda road was opened; Mandalay fell in March, and toward the end of April British forces had pushed down from the north toward Rangoon, which was taken by an amphibious force in May. By mid-June Burma was practically reconquered. In China, because of internal strife, the story was somewhat different; China north of the Yellow River was in Japanese hands when in the spring of 1944, the Japanese began a campaign to split off the western areas of China from contact with the provisional capital and to join their holdings on the continent from Manchuria to Singapore. By the beginning of December forces striking south from Honan had joined with those advancing north from Canton, and together they moved westward to link up with additional forces coming north from Indochina; the result was an open corridor from north to south across Asia and the cutting off of coastal China from supplies from India. The liberation of Burma, the fall of Germany, and the concentration of Allied force toward the Pacific led, however, in the early summer of 1945 to a cessation of the mopping-up campaign in western China, the withdrawal of Japanese troops from advanced positions, and the rejoining of western and eastern China with the capture of Nanning.

Africa and Italy. The problem of entering Hitler's "Fortress Europa" engaged the minds of the Allied strategists in the west, some supporting a plan for direct invasion of France, some maintaining that the "soft underbelly" of the Continent was the best place for invasion. Meanwhile the Germans had again gone on the offensive in Russia, directing their attacks principally against the valuable oil fields of the Caspian-Caucasus region. Maikop fell in August and the Don was crossed in the same month, but the German attack on Stalingrad, beginning August 22, met with strong resistance. The pressure on Russia was extremely strong and growing greater day by day; Moscow, Leningrad, and now Stalingrad were siege targets; the Ukraine was far behind the German lines and supplies were scarce. To relieve this the Allies decided not to wait for force to build up sufficiently to make a direct attack on Europe but to open an offensive in Africa. After a series of attacks and counterattacks in North Africa across the Libyan-Egyptian border, marked by a long siege of the British garrison at Tobruk in 1941, the German Afrika Korps, led by Erwin Rommel, had advanced into Egypt to within 100 miles of Alexandria. There, at El Alamein, the line was stabilized until Oct. 23, 1942, when the British under Montgomery opened an offensive that drove the Germans out of Libya. On November 8, an Allied force, part of which sailed directly from America, part from England, landed at points in French North Africa. Fighting, where it occurred, ended quickly, but as a result all of France was occupied by the Germans. The two Allied forces, the British advancing from El Alamein, the American-British-French force in the west under Dwight Eisenhower, squeezed the Germans into Tunisia; the two forces made contact at the end of March and by the beginning of May had completely freed North Africa of Axis troops. After a brief pause, the Allies invaded Sicily on July 10; on August 17, Messina, separated by only a narrow strait from continental Italy, was captured and Sicily was in the hands of the Allies. One important result of the Sicilian campaign was the fall of Benito Mussolini, who had been dictator since 1922, and who was replaced on July 25; Mussolini later was rescued by the Germans and taken to north Italy, but he then headed an obviously puppet government and had lost his power as a symbol of Italian unity. The Allies landed in southern Italy on September 2; the new Italian government surrendered at once, but the Germans continued to fight on Italian soil. On September 9 American troops landed at Salerno and, taking Naples on October 1 after being joined by troops racing up the west coast, continued up the peninsula toward Rome. In front of Cassino the Germans held and the Allied advance came to a halt. A landing, similar to the leapfrogging done at Salerno, was made at Anzio, just south of Rome, in January, but the beachhead was difficult to maintain and the bold attempt to turn the German flank failed. It was not until a frontal attack on Cassino, entailing the bombing and destruction of the ancient monastery there, carried the German positions after two months of heavy fighting, that the front again became mobile. Cassino was captured May 18, and on June 4 Rome was taken.

The Battle of Europe. The Allied successes in Italy and the continued guerrilla resistance in the Balkans and France were premonitions of disaster for Germany. In Russia, the battle of Stalingrad was fought to its bitter conclusion in the winter of 1942-43 with German troops absorbing a series of disastrous defeats all through the area; on Feb. 2, 1943, a month after Leningrad had been freed from its siege, the huge German army at Stalingrad was surrounded and destroyed, Germany losing a third of a million men, and then reeling backward past the Donets and Kharkov. In the spring Germany was able to attack once more, but the Russians, now getting supplies through the Persian Gulf and Murmansk from the factories of the U.S. and with new war industries of her own beginning to produce, counterattacked in the summer and by early fall Russian troops were at the Dnieper, Kiev was retaken in November, months after Smolensk, another important city, was liberated. The early months of 1944 found the Russians past their prewar borders in the north, advancing into Estonia and Poland, and to the south reaching the Rumanian border in March. The Crimea was cleared in May, and Russia was on the verge of having recaptured all its territory and beginning the conquest of Germany and its satellites. German reinforcement of the Eastern Front at this stage was impossible, because on June 6, 1944, the Allied invasion of France had begun. This attack across the Channel into Normandy had been preceded by a great build-up of troops in England and by careful planning that included the building of two great artificial ports, each the size of the port of Dover, so that supplies could be landed for the great invasion force, for which ships and planes had been massing for weeks. Preceded by an attack by parachute troops and by a wave of airplane bombing raids and a bombardment of the coastal defenses by warships, the invasion forces made their landings along the coast of Normandy north of the Cotentin Peninsula. The beachhead was expanded, the Cotentin Peninsula was cut off, and on June 27 the port of Cherbourg was captured. Caen fell to the British on July 9 and on July 18 St.-Lô was taken. On July 25 the breakout from the landing area was begun with an attack past St.-Lô, and it quickly spread far out into Brittany, reaching Nantes and the Loire by August 10. On August 15 Allied forces invaded southern France, where within two weeks they had taken Toulon and Marseilles; they then continued up the valley of the Rhone. Lyons was taken September 3, and on September 11, less than a month after they had landed, the forces from the south made junction with troops coming down from the north. The Germans had been falling back rapidly across France and withdrawing from Belgium as the Allied forces advanced; on August 25 Paris was liberated and by mid-September the Rhine was reached. Here the advance halted before stiffened German resistance. Attempting to maintain the pressure on the Germans, the Allies engaged in an airborne flanking attack on Arnhem, Nijmegen, and Eindhoven in September; the troops in this mass drop were to be joined by ground forces according to the plan striking upward to meet them, but the attack was unable to cross the Rhine, and the group at Arnhem had to be evacuated. Efforts were now turned to clearing up such spots as the German-held approaches to the port of Antwerp. While the Allied forces were thus deployed in mopping up and probing for a place through which Germany might be attacked, the Germans launched an assault of their own on December 16 by attacking through the Ardennes toward Liège and Antwerp and driving a large wedge into the Allied lines. The German force used in this Battle of the Bulge was soon contained; after moving forward 50 miles the Germans withdrew and were back to their original positions by January 25, having lost a quarter of a million men and much irreplaceable matériel. The stage was now set for the final assault on Germany itself; this time there would be no "undefeated" German army as there had been in World War I. From the east and west Allied troops poised for the attack. Russia began its offensive in Poland in mid-January, took Warsaw, where a heroic but futile partisan effort to liberate the city had taken place months before, and the Germans were driven from the Vistula. To the south Budapest fell on February 13; two weeks earlier, on January 31, Russian troops were at the Oder 40 miles from Berlin. On February 8, the Allies began a campaign in the west to bring them to the Rhine all along the front, and as the Germans fell back to the east of the river the bridges across the Rhine were destroyed, making the crossing in prospect a hazardous and expensive undertaking. But when, on March 7, units of the 1st American Army reached the Rhine at Remagen, there still stood one bridge across the river, and though the bridge was later destroyed, the Rhine had meanwhile been crossed. However, it was at Wesel, to the north of Remagen, that the principal crossing was forced on March 23 and the German defense quickly crumbled before a mechanized attack that outdid anything the German tacticians had foreseen. German units were outraced, surrounded, and surrendered or were cut to pieces. Down the network of highways the Germans had built for their own mechanized army raced American tanks, half-tracks, jeeps, trucks, destroying Germany's military strength. On April 20 the Russians were in the streets of Berlin, now more a symbol than a military objective; on April 25 American and Russian troops met at Torgau, east of Leipzig, and Germany had been cut in half. While the Russians were taking Berlin by hard house-to-house fighting, and Adolf Hitler died in the blazing ruin of his capital, the troops under Eisenhower were sweeping southward into Czechoslovakia and Austria and toward Italy. There, on April 28, Mussolini had been caught by partisans and killed; on May 2, the Germans in northern Italy surrendered; and on May 4 the forces sweeping down from Germany met the conquerors of Italy at the Brenner Pass. As the Allied armies raced through Germany, huge numbers of Germans had given themselves up, in many instances as a preferable alternative to capture by the Russians, and finally, the German military machine having fallen apart, the German army surrendered unconditionally on May 7. V-E Day was proclaimed May 8, but the formalities of surrender were again gone through at Berlin the following day at Russian request. The war in Europe was over. The Allies now began to deploy troops toward Asia, where Japan still fought. Air raid after air raid smashed at Japanese factories, homes, military installations; shipping was reduced to a trickle by air, submarine, and surface craft attacks; but still it seemed that direct invasion would be necessary before the Japanese could be defeated. Plans for the assault were under way when, on Aug. 6, 1945, an American plane dropped the first atomic bomb on Hiroshima; more than 80,000 Japanese were killed by the one explosion, and warning was given that more such bombs were on the way. Russia declared war on Japan on August 8, in accordance with an agreement reached earlier, and advanced into Manchuria and Korea. On August 9 another atomic bomb destroyed a large area of Nagasaki; and the Japanese had had enough. They asked for peace the following day and accepted the Allied terms on August 14. On Sept. 2, 1945, six years and a day after the outbreak of war in Poland, the official surrender documents were signed aboard the U.S. battleship Missouri in Tokyo Bay.

Wörlitz (vêr'lîts). Town in C Germany, in the Land (state) of Saxony-Anhalt, Russian Zone, formerly in the free state of Anhalt, situated near the Elbe River, ab. 37 mi. SE of Magdeburg. It is famous for its gardens, park, and palace, the latter (erected 1769-73) in the neoclassical style. 3,059 (1946).

Wormeley (wêrm'li), Katharine Prescott. b. at Ipswich, England, Jan. 14, 1830; d. at Jackson, N.H., Aug. 4, 1908. American writer, best known for her translations of Balzac, Molière, Daudet, and other French writers.

Worms (wêrmz; German, Worms). [Ancient names, Borbetomagus, Civitas Vangionum.] City in W Germany, in the Land (state) of Rhineland-Palatinate, French Zone, formerly in the free state of Hesse, on the Rhine River, ab. 10 mi. NW of Mannheim. leather, machine, chemical, textile industries; sugar refinery; brewery; flour mills; trade in coal, grain, and wine. The Dom (cathedral), started in the 11th and finished in the 12th century, is a fine example of the Rhenish Romanesque style. Worms formerly contained the medieval Rashi Synagogue, in the Romanesque and Gothic styles (1175 and 1213), a Jewish museum, and a very old Jewish cemetery; these were destroyed by the Nazis in the pogroms of 1938. Pop. 52,239 (1950).

History. A Celtic and Roman settlement in ancient times. Worms became the capital of the Burgundian empire in the 5th century; it became famous because of its connection with the German heroic cycle of the Nibelungenlied. In the 12th century, the city became independent of the bishops and received the privileges of an imperial free city. It was one of the foremost cities of the medieval empire, sometimes called "Mother of Diets"; over 100 imperial diets were gathered here between the 8th and 16th centuries. The Concordat of Worms, dividing the Hapsburg domain between Charles V and Ferdinand I, was concluded here in 1521. After World War I, the city was occupied (1919-30) by French troops. It suffered severely in World War II.

Worms, Concordat of. See Concordat of Worms.

Worms, Diet of. Imperial diet, famous in the history of the Reformation, opened by the Emperor Charles V at Worms, Germany, Jan. 28, 1521. On March 6 Luther was cited to appear before the diet, and he arrived at Worms on April 16. On April 17 and 18 he appeared before the diet, and on the latter day refused to recant and defended his position. His determination was expressed in the famous words, "Here I stand. I cannot do otherwise. God help me. Amen." Luther, who had attended under a safe-conduct, was ordered to leave and was placed under the imperial ban.

Worsaae (wôr'sô), Jens Jacob Asmusen. b. at Vejle, Denmark, March 14, 1821; d. near Holbæk, Denmark, Aug. 15, 1885. Danish historian and antiquary. He was director of the Museum of Northern Antiquities at Copenhagen (1866 et seq.) and minister of public worship (1874-75).

Worth, William Jenkins. b. at Hudson, N.Y., March 1, 1794; d. at San Antonio, Tex., May 7, 1849. American general. He entered the army in 1813, fought at the battle of Niagara in 1814, and was promoted major. He became superintendent at West Point after the war. He was commander in the Seminole War in 1841, which he ended, and was second in command under Taylor at the opening of the Mexican War. He gained distinction by his storming of the bishop's palace at the battle of Monterey in 1846; sent to join General Scott's army and brevetted major general, he fought in the battles of Cerro Gordo, Perote, San Antonio, Churubusco, Molino del Rey, and Chapultepec, and took part in the occupation of Mexico City. Later he commanded in Texas.

Worth, William Scott. b. at Albany, N.Y., Jan. 6, 1840; d. at Clifton, Staten Island, N.Y., Oct. 16, 1904. American soldier in the Civil War and Spanish-American War; son of William Jenkins Worth. He entered the army in 1861, served with the Army of the Potomac from 1862, was engaged in frontier duty (1872-91), and rose to the rank of colonel in 1898. He served in the Santiago campaign, was severely wounded at San Juan Hill, and was promoted brigadier general in 1898.

Wotton (wɒt(ə)n), Sir Henry. b. in Kent, England, 1568; d. at Eton, England, in December, 1639. English diplomat and author. He was educated at Winchester and Oxford, and went to the Continent in 1588, where he remained until 1595. In 1595 he became secretary to the Earl of Essex. He was special envoy from Tuscany to James VI of Scotland, English ambassador to Venice and Germany, and in 1624 provost of Eton College. He wrote poems, various Latin pamphlets, The Elements of Architecture, and State of Christendom. The Reliquiae Wottonianae (1651) contains most of his works.

Wotton, William. b. at Wrentham, Suffolk, England, Aug. 13, 1666; d. at Buxted, Essex, England, Feb. 13, 1727. English clergyman and scholar. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was admitted in his tenth year. When 12 years old he was noted for skill in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, several of the Eastern tongues, philosophy, mathematics, and other subjects; took his degree of B.A. in January, 1679, then knowing 12 languages; and became a fellow of Saint John's College, Cambridge, in 1683. He became chaplain to the Earl of Nottingham and rector of Middleton Keynes, Buckinghamshire, in 1693, and prebendary of Salisbury in 1705. He is best known for his Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning (1694).

Wouk (wouk), Herman. b. at New York, May 27, 1915—. American writer. He wrote scripts (1936-41) for the Fred Allen radio program and then was a writer (1941-42) of radio shows for the war-bond drives of the U.S. Treasury Department. During World War II he served on destroyers and mine-sweepers in the Pacific. Author of Aurora Dawn (1942, a satire on advertising), The City Boy (1948, a semi-autobiographical novel), Slattery's Hurricane (1949, a story for the motion pictures), The Traitor (1949, a drama), and The Caine Mutiny (1951, a novel based on his wartime experiences and for which he won the 1952 Pulitzer prize for fiction).

Dutch painter, known for his battle pieces, hunting scenes, cavalry skirmishes, horses, and the like. His works are at Dresden, Paris, The Hague, Munich, Vienna, and elsewhere.

Wovoka (wō.vō'ka). [English name, Jack Wilson.] b. near Walker Lake, Nev., c1856; d. in October, 1932. Paiute Indian shaman and mystic; grandson of the originator of the 1870 ghost dance religion. About 1889 Wovoka had a vision during a fever, in which he entered the spirit world and was told that all their ancient lands would be restored to the Indians, and that the dead would be reunited with them to partake of renewed well-being. They were to prepare for this by observing certain religious practices and dances. The teachings of Wovoka came to the Indians of the Plains at a time (1890) of cultural despair caused by white encroachment. The new religion, with Wovoka hailed as a messiah, swept over half the continent. Many of the Plains tribes danced the ghost dance every night, gave up their material possessions, and awaited the return of the dead and the restoration of their aboriginal well-being. The new religion did not affect the Pueblo Indians or those of the eastern Woodlands culture.

Woyrsch (voirsh), Felix. b. at Troppau (now Opava), in Austrian Silesia, Oct. 8, 1860—. Austrian composer and music teacher. Among his compositions are the oratorios Passions-Oratorium, Totentanz, and Deutscher Heerbann; a symphonic prologue to Dante's Divina Commedia; the operas Der Pfarrer von Meudon and Wikingerefahrt; five symphonies; songs, chamber music, and works for chorus with orchestra.

Wrangel or Wrangell (rang'gel; Russian, vrān'gil), Baron Ferdinand von. b. at Pskov, Russia, Dec. 29, 1796; d. at Tartu (Dorpat), in Estonia, June 6, 1870. Russian vice-admiral and explorer. He accompanied an expedition round the world (1817-19), conducted an exploring expedition in the arctic regions (1820-24), and was chief of an expedition round the world (1825-27). Later he was governor of Russian America (Alaska), and director of the Russian-American Trading Company. He wrote an account of his expedition in Russian (1841). Extracts from his journal were published in German in 1839.

Wrangel (vrāng'el), Count Friedrich Heinrich Ernst. [Called "Papa" Wrangel.] b. at Stettin, in Pomerania, April 13, 1784; d. at Berlin, Nov. 1, 1877. Prussian field marshal. He served in the Napoleonic wars, commanded in Schleswig-Holstein and Berlin (1848), and led the army against Denmark in 1864.

Wrangel, Karl Gustav. [Title, Count of Salmis and Sölvesborg.] b. Dec. 13, 1613; d. on the island of Rügen, June 24, 1676. Swedish field marshal. He served in the army and navy in the Thirty Years' War, succeeded Torstenson as commander in chief, with Turenne defeated (May 17, 1648) the Imperialists and Bavarians at Zusmarshausen, commanded in the wars against Poland and Denmark and against Brandenburg (1674), and was defeated (1675) at Fehrbellin.

Wrangel (rang'gel; Russian, vrān'gil), Baron Piotr Nikolayevich. b. at St. Petersburg, Aug. 15, 1878; d. at Brussels, April 25, 1928. Russian soldier. After a term in the horse guards in his youth, he engaged in mining engineering in Siberia, but served as an officer in a Cossack regiment during the Russo-Japanese War, and thereafter remained in the army. In World War I he commanded a Cossack division; and, refusing to accept the October (1917) Revolution, he joined the counter-revolutionists in arms, cooperating with Admiral Kolchak and General Denikin. The latter, succeeding Kolchak as commander in chief of the White Russian armies, was forced back to the Black Sea littoral, and in April, 1920, turned over his command to Wrangel. With great energy Wrangel reorganized the demoralized White army, which once more overran a considerable part of southern Russia. When, however, the Bolsheviks concluded an armistice with Poland in October, 1920, thus freeing additional Red forces for operations in the south, the White armies were doomed. In November Wrangel was forced back into the Crimea, and by the middle of that month he and some 130,000 of his followers were in flight to Constantinople and other refuges. For a time Wrangel maintained a headquarters at Belgrade, ostensibly to assist his veterans to settle in various countries, but also in the hope of another turn in the fortunes of war. Eventually he seems to have abandoned that hope and, settling in Brussels, spent his last years as a mining engineer.

He commanded the Bavarian contingent in the invasion of Russia in 1812, went over to the Allies in 1813, took part in the battle of La Rothière in 1814, was distinguished at Rosny, Bar-sur-Aube, and Arcis-sur-Aube in 1814, took part in the Congress of Vienna (1814-15), and was generalissimo of the Bavarian army in 1822.

Wren (ren), Sir Christopher. b. at East Knoyle, Wiltshire, England, Oct. 23, 1632; d. at Hampton Court, near London, Feb. 25, 1723. English architect. He was educated at Westminster School and at Wadham College, Oxford, and was made professor of astronomy at Gresham College in 1657, Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford in 1660, and deputy surveyor general of public works in 1661. He designed the fortifications of Tangier in 1663, was created president of the Royal Society in 1680, and designed Saint Paul's Cathedral, London. Among his other designs were the cloister and chapel of Brasenose College, Oxford (1656), and the central spire of Lichfield Cathedral (1662-69). He was appointed on a committee for the survey of Old Saint Paul's (1663), and designed Pembroke College Chapel, Cambridge (1663-65). He was surveyor at Greenwich (1663-67), and designed the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford (1664-69).

On Oct. 4, 1666, he was appointed on a committee with May, Pratt, and others, to survey the ruins of London after the great fire, and to make plans for the reconstruction of the burned district, was appointed surveyor general of all the royal works in 1669, and built Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside (1667-71), Temple Bar, in Fleet Street, the "Monument" (202 ft. high; 1671-81), Saint Bride, in Fleet Street (1671-80), Saint Stephen's, Walbrook (1677-79), Drury Lane Theatre, the Royal Observatory at Greenwich (1675), and Hampton Court Palace for King William III (1699). He built the Royal Naval Hospital (1692-1716), giving his services without compensation. In 1706 he remodeled Saint Stephen's Chapel for the enlarged membership (Scottish) of Parliament; in 1709-10 Marlborough House, in Pall Mall; and in 1713 designed the towers of Westminster Abbey (largely, however, built under the supervision of his assistant).

ment at New York, she was active with the pen and on the platform on behalf of such causes as the more equitable distribution of property, the abolition of the banking system, birth control, and the emancipation of women and of Negro slaves.

Wright, Frank Lloyd. b. at Richland Center, Wis., June 8, 1869—. American architect who developed a style of architecture with emphasis on the purpose of the building, the nature of the materials, and the relation of the building to the surrounding landscape, as opposed to the neoclassical and neo-Gothic styles of the 19th century. It was early known as the "Prairie Style" because the first buildings to attract wide attention were houses designed to harmonize with flat country. His work was first appreciated in Europe, but later became very influential in the U.S. also. It constitutes one of the two chief movements of the 20th century, the other being the work of the so-called international school, based on the forms and surfaces of concrete, glass, and other modern materials and emphasizing the potentialities of the machine. Wright's influence has been spread also by the Taliesin Fellowship, a system of training apprentice architects which he founded and directs. He himself studied at the University of Wisconsin from 1884 to 1888, but his greatest influences were H. H. Richardson and Louis Sullivan. He worked for a time with the latter at Chicago, where he began to practice in 1893. His most famous constructions include the Larkin Company administration building at Buffalo, N.Y. (1904), the Robie house at Chicago (1909), Taliesin I (1909), II (1911), and III (1925) at Spring Green, Wis., Midway Gardens at Chicago (1914; now destroyed), Imperial Hotel at Tokyo (1916–22), Edgar Kaufmann house at Bear Run, Pa. (1936), Taliesin West, near Phoenix, Ariz. (1938), Suntop homes at Ardmore, Pa. (1939), S. C. Johnson and Son, Inc., administration building at Racine, Wis. (1936–39), and Florida Southern College at Lakeland, Fla. (1940 et seq.).

Wright, Marcus Joseph. b. at Purdy, Tenn., June 5, 1831; d. at Washington, D.C., Dec. 27, 1922. American soldier and historian. An officer in the Confederate army, he became (1862) a brigadier general; he was named (1878) official U.S. government agent for the assembling of Confederate archives, serving in this position until his retirement in 1917. His works include Tennessee in the War, 1861–65 (1908) and General Officers of the Confederate Army (1911).

Wright, Orville. b. at Dayton, Ohio, Aug. 19, 1871; d. there, Jan. 30, 1948; and Wilbur, b. at Millville, Ind., April 16, 1867; d. at Dayton, Ohio, May 30, 1912. American inventors of the airplane. As boys they kept in pocket money by making and selling mechanical toys; later Orville built a printing press, set up as a printer, and with Wilbur published a weekly paper. From 1892 to 1904 the brothers engaged successfully in the manufacture of bicycles, meanwhile becoming increasingly interested in the problem of flight. They followed closely the glider experiments of Gustav Lilienthal in Germany and of Octave Chanute in the U.S., enlisting the latter's interest and encouragement. With a thoroughly scientific approach, they built gliders, took them (1900–02) to Kill Devil Hill, a sand bar between Albemarle Sound and the Atlantic Ocean near Kitty Hawk, N.C., where the U.S. Weather Bureau advised them that they would find the most favorable conditions for their experiments, and patiently studied problems of wind currents, stability, and maneuvering. At Dayton, Orville constructed a wind tunnel where they tested hundreds of small models. By 1903 they were ready to attempt powered flight, and at Kill Devil Hill on December 17 of that year their first flying machine (a biplane powered by a four-cylinder motor and launched by a catapult) made four short flights, with the brothers alternating as pilots. The press had been invited to cover the event, but actually only five spectators watched man's first conquest of the air in a powered machine. At the end of the last of these four flights, which covered 852 ft. in 59 seconds, the plane was damaged in landing. The Wrights now turned to further study and experiment, and by October, 1905, at Dayton, were able to make a circular flight of 24 miles. They disposed of their bicycle business, devoted themselves entirely to building planes, received a U.S. patent in May, 1906, and late in 1907 submitted one of three bids which the U.S. government accepted (out of a larger number submitted) for the construction of a flying machine. During tests in September, 1908, Orville was injured and a passenger was killed in an accident, but in 1909 the Wrights alone of the three accepted bidders successfully completed their demonstration, and their plane was acquired by the War Department. Meanwhile Wilbur had taken a plane to France, where his successful flights aroused enthusiastic interest. In the fall of 1909, in connection with the Hudson-Fulton Celebration, Wilbur made flights over New York harbor and the Hudson River. In that year they formed the Wright Company, and made profitable contracts with syndicates in England, France, Germany, and Italy. The Wrights notoriously profited far less than they might have from their epoch-making achievements. Patent suits plagued them and, though they were sustained by the courts, worry over these litigations contributed to Wilbur's death in 1912. In 1915 Orville sold his interest in the Wright Company, but he continued to do research and to act as a consultant, serving also on the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. In 1928, piqued by the action of the Smithsonian Institution in labeling Samuel P. Langley's 1903 plane as the first to make a successful flight, Orville sent the first Wright plane to the South Kensington Museum at London, but he later secured its return, and since 1948 it has been exhibited at the Smithsonian at Washington. He is the author of How We Invented the Airplane. (1953).

Wright, Philip Green. b. at Boston, Oct. 3, 1861; d. Sept. 4, 1934. American educator, economist, and poet. He served (1917-22) with the U.S. Tariff Commission and was a member (1922-31) of the Institute of Economics. Author of Sugar in Relation to the Tariff (1924), The Tariff on Animal and Vegetable Oils (1928), and The Cuban Situation and Our Treaty Relations (1931). His volumes of poetry include The Dial of the Heart (1904) and The Dreamer (1906).

Wright, Richard. b. near Natchez, Miss., Sept. 4, 1908—. American Negro novelist. He became self-supporting at the age of 15, working at odd jobs at Chicago and elsewhere, was employed (1935 et seq.) by the Federal Writers' Project (WPA), and in 1935 was awarded the 500-dollar prize (for the best story by a WPA writer) offered by Story. His works include Uncle Tom's Children (1938; enlarged ed., 1940), Native Son (1940), 12 Million Black Voices (1941), and Black Boy (1945).

Wright, Russell. b. at Lebanon, Ohio, April 3, 1903—. American industrial designer. From furniture and radio cabinets he went on to wallpaper, rugs, glassware, and chinaware. His "American Modern Dinnerware," first put on the market in 1939, has sold very extensively and has had a marked effect on design in that field. He has expounded his principles in magazine articles and in Guide to Exsiv Living (with his wife, 1950).

Wright, Silas. b. at Amherst, Mass., May 24, 1795; d. at Canton, N.Y., Aug. 27, 1847. American statesman. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1815, studied law, settled at Canton, St. Lawrence County, N.Y., and became surrogate of St. Lawrence County and later state senator. He was a member of Congress from New York (1827-29), comptroller of the state of New York (1829-33), U.S. senator (1833-41), and governor of New York (1845-47). He opposed the anti-rent rioters, and declined several cabinet offices and foreign missions.

Wright, Thomas. b. near Ludlow, England, April 23, 1810; d. at London, Dec. 23, 1877. English antiquary and historian. He was one of the founders of the Percy, Camden, and Shakespeare societies, and the British Archaeological Association. He directed the excavation of Uriconium (near modern Wroxeter, in Shropshire). His numerous works include Early English Poetry, in black letter (1836), an edition of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Life of Merlin (with Michel, 1838), and Queen Elizabeth and her Times, a series of original letters (1838). He edited Political Songs of England (1839), Reliquiae Antiquae (with Halliwell, 1839), Political Ballads (1841), Map's Latin poems (1841), The Vision and Creed of Piers Plowman (1842), Biographia Literaria (1842), The Chester Plays (1843-47), Anecdota Literaria (1844), and The Archaeological Album (1845). He also wrote Essays on Subjects Connected with the Literature, Popular Superstitions, and History of England in the Middle Ages (1846); edited The Canterbury Tales (1847-51), Early Travels in Palestine (1848), and various editions of Early English works; wrote England under the House of Hanover, Illustrated from the Caricatures and Satires of the Day (1848); a new edition in 1868, entitled Caricature History of the Georges; History of Ireland (1848-52), Narratives of Sorcery and Magic (1851), The Celt, the Roman, and the Saxon (1852), Universal Pronouncing Dictionary and Expositor of the English Language (1852-56), History of Scotland (1852-57), Wanderings of an Antiquary (1854), Dictionary of Obsolete and Provincial English (1857), A Volume of Vocabulary (1857), History of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table, compiled from Malory (1858), History of France (1858-62), Les Cent Nouvelles nouvelles (medieval tales, 1858), descriptions of Uriconium, Political Poems and Songs Relating to English History (1859-61), Essays on Archaeological Subjects (1861), Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages (1862); edited Giralduus Cambrensis (1863); wrote History of Caricature and Grotesque (1865); translated, at the author's request, Napoleon's Vie de Jules César (1865-66); and wrote Womankind in Western Europe (1869), Uriconium (1872), and Anglo-Latin Satirical Poets of the Twelfth Century (1877).

Wrocław (vrò'tsläf). [German, Breslau.] Województwo (province or voivodship) in SW Poland, formed (1945) from German Lower Silesia and parts of Brandenburg. Capital, Wrocław; area, ab. 9,552 sq. mi.; pop. about two million.

Wrocław. [German, Breslau.] City in SW Poland, capital of the województwo (province) of Wrocław (formerly capital of Lower Silesia, Germany), situated on the Oder River ab. 180 mi. SE of Berlin: river port and a leading commercial center; for centuries one of the principal places of exchange between C and E Europe. Formerly famous for its fairs, it has metal, machine, garment, and food industries, distilleries, a railroad-car factory (one of the largest in Europe), manufactures of precision instruments and water meters, chemical (paints and lacquers) and electrical industries. Commerce is carried on chiefly in grain, wool, coal, metals and metal products, glass and glassware, and textiles. Pop. 629,565 (1939), 170,656 (1945), 279,373 (est. 1950).

Architecture. The town hall (14th-16th centuries), one of the finest examples of Gothic secular architecture in E Europe, is still standing, as is the 14th-century Church of Elizabeth; most of the other historic buildings were either completely destroyed or severely damaged through air raids and ground fighting in World War II. Among them are the cathedral and the churches of the Holy Cross (13th century), of the Magdalen (14th century), of Saint Vincent (14th-15th centuries), and of Saint Matthew (in the baroque style, 1698); also the University (partly destroyed), the former royal castle, and the former monastery of the Augustines, all in the Silesian baroque style of the 18th century, most of them erected in the period when Wrocław (then Breslau) was closely connected with artistic developments in Bohemia and Austria.

History. The city was destroyed by Mongols in 1241, and received numerous German settlers in the 13th and 14th centuries. It was under the crown of Bohemia 1335-1742, first as part of the Luxembourg, then of the Hapsburg, domain. The city suffered in the Thirty Years' War and in the Seven Years' War; it passed to Prussia in 1742. The former Jesuit academy became a university in 1811. Prussia's War of Liberation against Napoleon I started here with King Frederick William III's proclamation, issued on March 17, 1813. In World War II, the city was frequently bombed; it was allotted to Poland by decision of the Four Power Conference at Potsdam in 1945. The departure of the German population has made Wrocław, which was prior to World War II of mixed Protestant-Catholic character, with Protestants prevailing, a predominantly Catholic city. It was formerly also the seat of a considerable Jewish community, which disappeared during the Nazi period; the rabbinical seminary was the earliest Jewish theological seminary of the modern type and a model for other European and American institutions. The city suffered heavy damage during the war; 70 percent of all buildings were destroyed. Reconstruction of apartment houses, schools, hospitals, and other buildings is under way.

Wunderhorn (vún'dér.hörn). [Full title, Des Knaben Wunderhorn.] Three-volume collection of German folk songs edited and published (1806-08) by Achim von Arnim and Clemens Brentano. Inspiration for the project may be traced back to Herder. It did for the folk song in Germany what the Kinder- und Hausmärchen of the Grimm brothers did for the folk tale. It was dedicated to Goethe, whose detailed review of it did much to enhance its popularity.

Wunderlich (vún'dér.líçh), Karl August. b. at Sulz am Neckar, Germany, Aug. 4, 1815; d. at Leipzig, Germany, Sept. 25, 1877. German physician and medical writer, professor at Leipzig from 1850. His chief work is Handbuch der Pathologie und Therapie (1846-54).

Wundt (vúnt), Wilhelm. b. near Mannheim, Germany, Aug. 16, 1832; d. Aug. 31, 1920. German psychologist, sometimes called the "father of experimental psychology." At Leipzig in the 1880's he had the foremost laboratory in the world; the first student was enrolled there in 1879, although the laboratory was not formally recognized by the university until 1883, and was not officially established until 1894. His influence was felt through both his numerous writings and his many disciples. He received his degree in medicine, but by 1874 he had abandoned physiology, accepted the chair of philosophy at Leipzig, and started on his way toward dominating the psychological world. In 1881 he founded the journal Philosophische Studien, the first journal of experimental psychology, to serve as an outlet for the work of his laboratory. His writings include Beiträge zur Theorie der Sinneswahrnehmung (1858-62), Vorlesung über die Menschen- und Tierseelen (1863), Grundzüge der physiologischen Psychologie (1873-74), Logik (1880-83), Grundriss der Psychologie (1896), and Völkerpsychologie (2 vols., 1900, 1905-06). Württemberg (wér'tem.bérg; German, vúr'tem.berk). Region and former kingdom of S Germany, bounded by Bavaria on the NE, E, and SE, by Lake Constance (separating it from Switzerland) on the S, and by Baden on the SW, W, and NW. It nearly enclosed Hohenzollern and had exclaves in Hohenzollern and Baden. The Black Forest is in the SW part and the Swabian Jura traverses the region from SW to NE. The chief rivers are the Neckar and Danube. Württemberg was divided into four Kreise ("circles" or districts): Neckar, Jagst, Black Forest, and Danube. It sent four representatives to the Bundesrat and 17 to the Reichstag. The early inhabitants of this region were Celts, followed by the Suevi. It was partly under Roman rule from the 1st to the 3rd century, was overrun by the Alamanni, who were conquered by Clovis, and formed part of the duchy of Swabia. The real history of Württemberg begins in the 13th century with its counts. Count Eberhard III of Bart was raised to the rank of duke in 1495. Württemberg suffered in the Thirty Years' War, ceded Montbéliard to France (which had seized it in 1793) in 1796, received considerable territory in 1803, and became an electorate in that year and a kingdom in 1806 under Frederick I, who joined the Confederation of the Rhine and sided with the Allies in 1813. It entered the Germanic Confederation, received a constitution in 1819, was the scene of liberal movements in the period 1848-50, and sided with Austria in 1866 and was forced to pay an indemnity. It entered the German Empire in 1871. At the end of World War II it was divided into two parts, the N part, with N Baden, becoming the Land (state) of Württemberg-Baden and the S part, combined with Hohenzollern, becoming Württemberg-Hohenzollern. The capital was Stuttgart; area, ab. 7,528 sq. mi.

On returning he went to Oxford and later to the Middle Temple and studied law, became a courtier at the court of Charles II, and was imprisoned several years for debt after the death of his first wife, the Countess of Drogheda, whose fortune involved him in litigation. James II set him free, gave him a pension, and paid his debts out of admiration for his play The Plain Dealer. In 1715 he married again, but died shortly after. He wrote the plays Love in a Wood (1672), The Gentleman Dancing Master (1672), The Country Wife (1673), and The Plain Dealer (1677).

Wych Street (wich). London street which opens behind Holywell Street, close to the entrance of Clement's Inn. This street is famous in the annals of London thieving for the exploits of Jack Sheppard, who gave rendezvous to his boon companions at the White Lion (now pulled down) in White Lion Passage. It was from the Angel Inn in Wyeb Street that Bishop Hooper, in 1554, was taken to die for his faith at Gloucester.

Wyckoff (wī'kof), Walter Augustus. b. at Mainpuri, India, April 12, 1865; d. at Princeton, N.J., May 15, 1908. American political economist, assistant professor of political economy at Princeton University from 1898. He is best known for his practical studies (as a worker and tramp) of the life of the wage-earners and tramps. He published The Workers—The East (1897), The Workers—The West (1898), A Day with a Tramp and Other Days (1900), and others.

Wycliffe or Wyclif (wik'lif), John. [Also: Wiclif, Wicliffe.] b. at Spreswel (thought to be either Hipswell or Barford), near Richmond, Yorkshire, England, c.1324; d. at Lutterworth, Leicestershire, England, Dec. 31, 1384. English religious reformer, called "the Morning Star of the Reformation." He was a fellow, and later (1360) master, of Balliol College, Oxford, and became rector of Millington, Lincolnshire, in the same year, and in 1368 of Ludgershall, Buckinghamshire, and in 1374 of Lutterworth. (The warden of Canterbury Hall 1365-67 was probably another John Wyclif, of Merton, Oxford, vicar of Mayfield; there is much confusion between the early lives of these two.) He went with John of Gaunt as royal ambassador to confer with papal nuncios at Bruges in 1374, was a popular preacher at London, and was summoned before Convocation in 1377 as an enemy to Rome on account of his attacks on the inordinate arrogance and wealth and power of the higher clergy (this blow was really aimed at John of Gaunt). The Pope signed five bulls against him, authorizing his imprisonment. The schism in the papacy, due to the election of Clement VII, in place of Urban VI, induced him to throw off his allegiance to the papacy. He opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation at Oxford in 1380, and was condemned by the university; and his party was opposed and persecuted by Courtenay (archbishop of Canterbury) and others in 1382. He went back to Lutterworth, where he wrote ceaselessly and fearlessly against papal claims, and in opposition to mere formalism. On Dec. 28, 1384, he was seized with paralysis while hearing Mass, and died in a few days. In 1428 his bones were exhumed, burned, and their ashes cast into the Swift, by order of the Synod of Constance. He made the first complete translation of the Bible into English (c.1382) from the Vulgate, assisted by Nicholas of Hereford. The latter translated the Old Testament and the apocryphal books to about the third chapter of the Book of Baruch. Wycliffe certainly translated the Gospels (probably c.1360), and presumably all the rest. He wrote many tracts and sermons: De Juremendo Arnaldi, Trilogus, De officio pastoralis, De ecclesia, De benedicta incarnatione, De dominio divino, and others. His works were edited (1882-92) by the Wyclif Society.

His Orryginale Cronykil of Scotland, in rhymed eight-syllable verse, was finished between 1420 and 1424 (edited by D. Laing, 1872-79).

Wyoming (wi.ô'ming). [Called the "Equality State."] State of the W United States, bounded by Montana on the N, South Dakota and Nebraska on the E, Colorado and Utah on the S, and Utah on the W.

Population, Area, and Political Divisions. Wyoming is divided for administrative purposes into 23 counties and Yellowstone National Park. The state sends one representative to Congress, and has three electoral votes. Leading cities are Casper and Cheyenne. Capital, Cheyenne; area, 97,506 sq. mi. (97,914 sq. mi., including water); pop. 290,529 (1950), an increase of 15.9 percent over the 1940 figure. The state ranks eighth in area, and 48th (on the basis of the 1950 census) in population (Nevada's is smaller, but the District of Columbia is for this purpose counted as a state).

Terrain and Climate. Wyoming is a high plateau (average altitude, ab. 6,000 ft.) traversed by the Rocky Mountains. Among the ranges in the state are the Medicine Bow, Laramie, Salt River, Big Horn, Wind River, Absaroka, and Teton. Highest point in the state is Gannett Peak (13,785), in the Wind River Range. In the NW corner of the state is Yellowstone National Park (ab. 3,199 sq. mi., lying within the state, the remainder falling in Montana and Idaho; established 1872). The oldest U.S. national park, Yellowstone is famous for its geysers, hot springs, and other scenic attractions. The state is also the site of Grand Teton National Park (ab. 148 sq. mi.; established 1929; 217,430 acres added in 1950 from former Jackson Hole National Monument). The North Platte River flows from the S to the C area and then E and SE into Nebraska, and receives in its course the waters of the Sweetwater and the Laramie. Pathfinder Dam on this river is used for irrigation, Seminole Dam for irrigation, power, and flood control. Other rivers of the state are the Big Horn, which rises in the C region and flows N into Montana; the Powder, which rises in the C area and flows N into Montana; the Belle Fourche, rising in the NE and flowing NE and then E into South Dakota; the Snake, which rises in Jackson Hole in the NW and flows S and E into Idaho; and the Yellowstone, which rises in Yellowstone Lake in the NW and flows N into Montana. The climate is dry, particularly in the summer season, and subject to extremes of heat and cold.

Industry, Agriculture, and Trade. Cattle and sheep raising is the great industry of the state, which has excellent grazing land. Hogs are also raised extensively. Dairy products and wool are of great value. Irrigation and dry farming produce beans, wheat, oats, corn, hay, sugar beets, alfalfa, potatoes, and some fruits. A considerable lumbering industry is based on the extensive mountain forests. Mining is another large industry, although lack of sufficient transportation facilities has prevented full development of the state's great mineral wealth. Coal, bentonite, phosphate, and iron are among the chief items mined. The deposits of coal exceed those of any other state. Wyoming also has great resources of petroleum, natural gas, and natural gasoline. Casper, with petroleum deposits in the vicinity, is the site of many oil refineries. Cheyenne is a railroad center.

History. As part of the Louisiana region the greater part of Wyoming was acquired (1803) by the U.S. from France in the Louisiana Purchase. The first white settlement was made (1834) at Fort Laramie, now a national monument (ab. 214 acres; established 1938) and a historic spot on the old Oregon Trail. Mormons settled in the Green River area in 1853. The region was long troubled by Indians; organized (1868) as Wyoming Territory from areas which had earlier been included in Idaho, Utah, and South Dakota. The territory gave women suffrage, this being the first time women were given the vote in the U.S. Wyoming was admitted to the Union (as the 44th state) on July 10, 1890. The Johnson County war occurred (1892) when the large-scale cattlemen clashed with homesteaders. Teapot Dome, a naval oil reserve in the C part of the state, drew (1924) national attention in connection with alleged irregularities of its leasing to private oil interests by Albert B. Fall, secretary of the interior in President Harding's cabinet. Nellie Tayloe Ross, who served as governor from 1925 to 1927, having been elected to fill the unexpired term of her husband, was the first woman governor of any U.S. state.

Culture. The rural population of the state very slightly outnumbers the urban population (49.8 percent was classified as urban in the 1950 census). The foreign-born inhabitants are chiefly German, Scandinavian, and English. There are ab. 2,475 Indians in the state. The Jackson Hole country was once a great Indian hunting ground and later a fur-trading center for white settlers; today it is known for its hunting and fishing facilities. Here is located the national elk refuge. The entire state is known for its dude ranches, which each summer cater to many visitors from the E. The Yellowstone region attracts many tourists. Cody is a popular tourist resort founded (1835) by "Buffalo Bill" (Colonel William F. Cody). Cheyenne is the scene of a well-known annual rodeo. The state-supported University of Wyoming is at Laramie, with branches at Powell, Sheridan, and Torrington. The state motto is Cedant Arma Toga, meaning "Let Arms Yield to the Toga." The state flower is the Indian paintbrush.

Xirgu (hēr.gō), Margarita. b. at Molins de Rey, in Catalonia, Spain, 1888—. Spanish actress and theater manager. She was the leading Catalan actress before going to Madrid. After first appearing in amateur productions of Echegaray's plays, she started a triumphant career at the Principal Theatre at Barcelona, distinguishing herself in both comedy and tragedy with her versatility, extraordinary sensitivity, and naturalness of expression. She played leading roles in Salomé, Zaza, Lady of the Camelias, and the plays of Guimerà and other Catalan playwrights. In 1914 she transferred her career to Madrid and won acclaim there in plays by the Quinteros, Benavente, Galdós, and Shaw (Saint Joan). She was particularly impressive in classical roles, such as Seneca's Medea (1933), and as the heroines of plays by Lope de Vega and other Spanish masters, and came to be known as Spain's leading tragedienne; she also became Lorea's principal interpreter, playing his elemental heroines with memorable force. She managed the Teatro Español at Madrid from 1928 to 1935, modernized its scenery, and introduced modern methods of changing scenery quickly enough to dispense with the customary extremely free adaptations of the multi-scened Spanish classics.

Xystus Berulius (bē.tū'li.us). Latinized name of Birk, Sixt.

XYZ Affair. In U.S. history, an affair involving an American special mission to France in 1797, consisting of Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, which was dispatched for the purpose of smoothing strained relations between the U.S. and the French Directory. An attempt was made by three French agents (designated as X, Y, and Z) to bribe them into offering a considerable sum of money in order to secure the attention of the Directory. The U.S. mission refused the offer. It is on this occasion that Pinckney is supposed to have replied, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute." Actually, however, his words were: "It is No! No! Not a sixpence!" After the publication of the XYZ correspondence in 1798, the ill will created by the affair led to popular American demand for war against France.

Yakut Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic (yā.kōt'). [Also, Yakutsk (yā.kōtsk').] Republic in N U.S.S.R., in N central Siberia, in the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, bordering on the Arctic Ocean. It is very sparsely settled and in some places unexplored; the W part is a tableland crossed by low mountain ranges; the C part is occupied by the valleys of the Vilyui and Lena rivers; the E part is traversed by numerous high mountain ranges. Much of the area is covered with dense forests or swamps and in the N part and high mountains the land is barren. Most of the population is concentrated in the Lena River basin, where there are scattered gold, silver, and salt mines and some lumbering towns. Experimental farms have failed to produce food enough for the population; barley is the principal cereal grown, a few hardy vegetables are produced, and there is some dairy farming. Summers are short and warm except in the N; winters are long and bitterly cold with temperatures as low as 100° below zero having been recorded. Transportation is provided by a road which extends from Skovorodino, on the Trans-Siberian Railway, to Yakutsk, by air services, and by river navigation in the short summer season. In the days of the Russian Empire the government of Yakutsk occupied an area somewhat larger than the present republic. Capital, Yakutsk; area, 1,182,300 sq. mi.; pop. 400,544 (1939).

Yakuts (yā.kōts'). [Also, Saka.] Northeastern Turkic people closely allied to the inhabitants of the Altai Mountains, now forming the principal population of the Yakut Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic in Siberia. Yarmouth (yār'muth). [Official name, Great Yarmouth.] County borough, seaport, and fishing port in E England, in Norfolk, ab. 122 mi. NE of London by rail. Yarmouth is situated at the mouth of the river Yare, on the North Sea. It is the principal center of the English herring fishery, and claims to be the largest herring port in the world. Yarmouth is noted for its cured fish ("Yarmouth bloaters") famous with gourmets. The Yarmouth herring fishery was mentioned in the Domesday Book, and during the Middle Ages it had a famous herring fair. In connection with the herring fishery, the manufacture of barrels is carried on at Yarmouth. The Church of Saint Nicholas is the largest parish church in England, measuring 230 by 112 ft. The oldest part of the existing building is the nave (dating from 1190), in a style intermediate between the Norman and Early English. There was a lofty tower-mill in Yarmouth, the largest in Britain (ab. 120 ft. high), now demolished. Yarmouth has developed rapidly into a modern seaside health resort. 51,105 (1951).

Yates (yāts), Edmund Hodgson. b. at Edinburgh, July 3, 1831; d. May 20, 1894. English journalist and novelist. He retired from a position in the London general post office in 1872, lectured in the U.S. (1872-73), and went as special correspondent of the New York Herald to Vienna, St. Petersburg, and elsewhere (1873-75). He was connected with various periodicals, including Our Miscellany and the London Daily News, was editor of Temple Bar till 1867, when he became editor of Tinsley's Magazine, founded and edited the London World with Grenville Murray in 1874, and was London correspondent of the New York Tribune for a number of years before his death. As a columnist (1855 et seq.) for the Illustrated Times, Yates inaugurated the column of paragraphs about personalities; later, in The World, he conducted the first of the "society" papers, journals based on the interest of others in the activities of the prominent. He was expelled from the Garrick Club for some criticism he penned of William Makepeace Thackeray (1858) and was jailed for several weeks (1885) for a libel on Lord Lonsdale. Among his novels are For Better, for Worse (1863), Broken to Harness (1864), Kunning the Gauntlet (1866), Kissing the Rod (1866), The Black Sheep (1867), Wrecked in Port (1869), Castaway (1872), A Waiting Race (1872), and The Yellow Flag (1872). Yeats, William Butler. b. at Dublin, June 13, 1865; d. in France, Jan. 28, 1939. Irish poet, dramatist, and critic; son of John Butler Yeats. He was one of the founders of the Irish Literary Theatre (1898) and of the National Theatre Society at Dublin, and was identified with the movement for the revival of Irish national literature. His works include The Celtic Twilight (1893), Poems (1895), The Secret Rose (1897), The Wind among the Reeds (1899), Idea of Good and Evil (1903), In the Seven Woods (1903), Stories of Red Hanrahan (1904), John Millington Synge and the Ireland of His Time (1911), and The Cutting of an Apat (1912). His plays include The Countess Kathleen (1892), The Land of Heart's Desire (1894), The Shadowy Waters (1900), Cathleen ni Houlihan (1902), The Pot of Broth (1902), The Hour Glass and Other Plays (1903), On Baile's Strand (1904), Deirdre (1907), Plays for an Irish Theatre (1912), and others, including translations of Oedipus the King and Oedipus at Colonus. After having been, in his youth, a member of the Yellow Book group of artists and writers, he turned in his middle period, especially after his marriage (1917) to George Lees, whose occult activities as a medium convinced him of a link to the spirit world, to a more elaborate, more mystic symbolism; in The Vision (1925), a prose work, he discussed aspects of spiritualism. His late work is distinguished by its use of an extremely concise self-contained set of symbols to set forth his more austere realization of poetic truths, at the same time still embodying, as in his early works, the elements of Irish mythology; among these works are The Wild Swans at Coole (1917), The Tower (1927), and The Wind-ing Stair (1929), all books of verse. There have appeared Collected Poems (1933), Collected Plays (1934), and Last Poems and Plays. He was awarded (1923) the Nobel prize in literature.

Yellow Book. English magazine, published (1894-97) quarterly in book form. It had an influence disproportionate to the brevity of its career. At that time French novels, which were apt to seem daring to English readers, were often published in yellow paper covers, and the title Yellow Book intimated that this magazine, which was yellow-covered, inclined more toward Continental artistic freedom than toward Victorian proprieties. The American novelist Henry Harland was its literary editor, but it was the designs of its art editor, Aubrey Beardsley, fat, fāte, fār, āsk, fāre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pīne; not, nōte, mōve, nōr; up, lūte, pūll; ʔ, then; ʔ, d, d or j; s, s or sh; t, t or ch;

that most compellingly attracted the attention of the fin-de-siècle cognoscenti. The magazine was in the nature of a demonstration by the believers in "art for art's sake," but although its contents included much work by such figures as Beardsley, Oscar Wilde, and Ernest Dowson, it also numbered among its contributors Henry James, George Moore, John Davidson, and Edmund Gosse, and gave early encouragement to such men, then young, as Richard Le Gallienne, William Butler Yeats, H. G. Wells, and Arnold Bennett.

Below Yellowstone Lake are the Upper Fall (112 ft.) and Lower Fall (310 ft.). Below the falls is the famous Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone, ab. 30 mi. long and between 600 and 1,200 ft. deep. Its tributaries Tower Creek and Gardiner River also have noted falls. Length, ab. 671 mi.

Yellowstone Lake. Lake in Yellowstone National Park; source of the Yellowstone River. Elevation, ab. 7,731 ft.; length, ab. 20 mi.; area, ab. 139 sq. mi.

Yellowstone National Park. One of the principal U.S. national parks, and the first established (1872), occupying the NW corner of Wyoming and smaller adjacent areas in Idaho and Montana. Chiefly a high plateau of volcanic formation, it is surrounded by ranges of the Rocky Mountains including the Absaroka, Teton, and Wind River ranges and is traversed by the Continental Divide. The park contains over 100 geysers, best known of which is Old Faithful, whose eruptions occur almost exactly every 65 minutes and produce columns of water nearly at boiling temperature up to 130 ft. high. It also has many hot springs, famous for the many-colored formations surrounding them, caused by mineral deposits from the water and by the algae living in it. Mammoth Hot Springs, the largest group, forms a vast series of terraces up to 300 ft. high. Yellowstone Lake (ab. 15 by 20 mi.; elevation over 7,000 ft.) is one of the highest lakes of its size in the world, known for its scenery and its fishing. It is the source of Yellowstone River, whose two falls (the higher over 300 ft.) and Grand Canyon with its brilliantly colored walls are probably the most striking scenic features of the park. Yellowstone includes wild animal and bird refuges, large forest reserves, automobile roads and riding and hiking trails, and a number of hotels and lodges. First seen by a white man probably c1810, the region's wonders were largely discredited for many years, though later explorers described them in some detail. The Congressional decision to set it apart as a game preserve and public pleasure ground came as a result of an expedition led by Henry D. Washburn in 1870. Area, ab. 3,458 sq. mi.

Yemassee (yem.a.sē'). The. Novel by William Gilmore Simms, published in 1835.

Yemen (yem'en). Monarchy in SW Arabian peninsula, between the Hejaz, Aden, and Hadhramaut, and the Red Sea. In its most extended sense the name once included nearly all of Arabia (all S of Syria). The chief seaport is Hodeida; other ports are Mocha and Luhaiya. The interior highland of Yemen reaches elevations above 9,000 ft., and is the most humid part of the entire Arabian peninsula, with rainy seasons in midsummer (June to September) and in late winter (March). Because of the elevation summers, though warm, are much cooler than elsewhere in Arabia; frosts occur in winter and snow may fall on the highest summits. Cereals (barley, wheat, and millet) are the staple crops; fruit crops are also important, and vegetables are grown; coffee is the major commercial crop. Livestock are numerous, sheep, cattle, goats, and camels being the chief varieties. The most important export is coffee, of which some 15 million pounds are produced each year. It is widely known as Mocha coffee, named after the port through which it was first shipped. Long an isolated mountain kingdom, Yemen is now a member of the United Nations and is coming into greater contact with the outside world. In recent years there has been a large emigration of Yemenite Jews to the new state of Israel. Capital, Sana; area, ab. 75,000 sq. mi.; pop. ab. 4,000,000 (est. 1950).

Yeomen of the Guard. Military corps established by King Henry VII of England in 1485 as a personal bodyguard for the sovereigns of that country. On the occasion of its founder's coronation in that same year, it stood by him 50 strong; when his son and successor Henry VIII found it desirable to put up an imposing front when meeting Francis I of France, he increased the corps to 600 men, who in 1520 accompanied him to the Field of the Cloth of Gold. Thereafter the number of the yeomen dwindled, and in 1669 was stabilized by Charles II at 100 men plus a captain, a lieutenant, an ensign or standard-bearer, a clerk of the roster, and four corporals. When kings ceased to accompany their troops to battlefronts (the last English sovereign to do so being George II at the battle of Dettingen in 1743) and when violence went out of fashion as a means of determining succession to the throne, any real need for such a body as the Yeomen of the Guard ceased, but the corps has been continued for its symbolic interest and ceremonial usefulness. Under the later Georges and until 1843, many appointments to the Guards were purchased by civilians, but since that year membership (except as to the captain) has been restricted to veterans of the British army or marines, generally men who have won citations. The captain is now generally a member of the nobility, appointed by the lord chamberlain. The Yeomen's uniform derives from Tudor times; it has undergone variations, but now consists of a red tunic ornamented with purple facings and gold lace; red knee-breeches, red stockings, black shoes with colorful rosettes, a flat hat, and an Elizabethan ruff at the neck; they carry ornamental halberds and swords. Officers, however, wear a dress going back no farther than the Napoleonic wars. In 1605 it was members of the Yeomen of the Guard who seized Guy Fawkes in connection with the Gunpowder Plot, and in modern times the chief function of the corps, other than parading, is a symbolic search of the cellars of the Houses of Parliament for gunpowder at the opening of each session. Yeomen of the Guard, characteristically tall and robust men, are popularly known as Beefeaters because formerly their superior physical powers were sustained by especially generous rations of "the roast beef of Old England."

York, 3rd Duke of. [Title of Richard Plantagenet.] b. 1411; killed at the battle of Wakefield, England, 1460. English statesman; son of Richard, Earl of Cambridge, and Anne Mortimer, and grandson of Edmund of Langley, son of Edward III, in his father's line, and of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, also a son of Edward III, on his mother's side. He was constable of England and regent of France under Henry VI, later was lieutenant of Ireland, was protector during the incompetency of Henry VI, and was dismissed from office in 1455. York, who had been heir presumptive to the throne after the death of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, in 1447, was displaced (1453) by the birth of the heir apparent, Prince Edward, to Margaret of Anjou and Henry. He laid claim to the heirship to the throne and precipitated the Wars of the Roses in that year. In 1460 he was again for a short time protector, and by a compromise was recognized as heir to the throne, but this compromise was rejected by Queen Margaret, and York was defeated and slain at Wakefield. The Yorkist claim he put forth was prosecuted by his son Edward, however, and eventually Edward became king as Edward IV.

York, Duke of. [Title of Richard Plantagenet.] b. 1472; murdered in the Tower, 1483. Second son of Edward IV. He and his brother Edward V were placed in the Tower under the "protection" of their uncle Richard III, who soon afterward assumed the crown, the princes being declared illegitimate.

York, Cardinal. [Original name, Henry Benedict Maria Clement Stuart; assumed title, Henry IX (of England).] b. at Rome, 1725; d. at Frascati, Italy, July 13, 1807. English Roman Catholic prelate and pretender to the throne; son of the Old Pretender, James Francis Edward Stuart. He was created cardinal in 1747, and assumed the title of Henry IX of England on the death of his brother (Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender) in 1788. Ruined by the French Revolution, he lived at Venice and was granted a pension by George III. In gratitude, he left the Stuart crown jewels to the then Prince of Wales (later George IV) in his will.

York, Duke of. Title borne by Henry VIII and Charles I previous to the death of their elder brothers, and by James II, George V, and George VI before accession to the throne.

York. [Latin, Eboracum, Eburacum.] City and county borough, market town, and manufacturing center in N central England, in the West Riding of Yorksire, situated on the river Ouse ab. 188 mi. N of London by rail. It is noted for its chocolate manufactures, and formerly had a woolen industry, begun c1330. York has been the seat of an archbishopric since the 7th century. The cathedral (York Minster) is one of the chief English cathedrals, of Norman foundation, but entirely rebuilt in subsequent medieval periods. The interior was severely damaged by a fire set by a pyromaniac in 1829. The south transept, built in the first half of the 13th century, displays three tiers of arcades, increasing in size upward, and the gable is almost entirely occupied by a rose window. The square towers of the much-paneled west front date from the 15th century, as does the massive central tower; the choir and Lady chapel date from the 14th. The interior is highly impressive from its size and height. The elaborate vaulting is of wood. A massive sculptured rood screen separates the nave from the choir. The window, in Perpendicular style, which fills almost the whole east end measures 78 by 33 ft., being surpassed only by that at Gloucester. The north transept contains the celebrated group of lancets known as the Five Sisters. The cathedral possesses more old glass (14th and 15th centuries) than any other in England. Among its tombs that of Archbishop Grey (1255) is the most remarkable. The dimensions are 325 by 110 ft.; length of transepts, 222 ft.; height of vaulting, 100 ft.; of western towers, 201 ft. The octagonal chapter house, without fat, fâte, fâr, âsk, fâre; net, mē, hēr; pin, pīne; not, nôte, môve, nôr; up, lûte, pûll; ʔu, then; d, d o r j; s, s o r sh; t, t o r ch;

central pillar, is of exceptional beauty. The city walls make an almost complete circuit of the city; a footpath runs along the top. The walls date from the time of Edward III, and are pierced by four principal gates (there being a total of six). Micklegate Bar is one of the six medieval city gates. It is a high, square, battlemented tower, with bartizans on the angles, whose arch spans the roadway. Besides the cathedral there are several interesting churches, Saint Mary's Abbey, and a castle. The ancient 14th-century Guildhall was destroyed by enemy action in World War II (in 1942) and is now in ruins. York was the capital of Britain during the Roman occupation, was visited by Hadrian, and was the place of death of Lucius Septimius Severus and Constantius I (Constantinus Chlorus). In York Constantine was proclaimed emperor. It was the terminus of Ermine Street, an ancient Roman road from London. Later it was the capital of Northumbria and Deira, and an important Danish city. It was an early seat of learning. It was taken by William the Conqueror in 1068, revolted and was retaken by him in 1069, was the meeting place of several parliaments, and was besieged and taken (1644) by the Parliamentarians in the English Civil War. 105,336 (1951).

York, Alvin C. b. in Feirstown County, Tenn., Dec. 13, 1887—. American soldier. He enlisted (November, 1917) in the U.S. army, rose to the grade of sergeant in the 328th Infantry, 82nd Division, and became one of the outstanding heroes of World War I when, during an action in the Argonne on Oct. 8, 1918, he killed 20 Germans, captured a fortified hill, and forced the surrender of 132 Germans and 35 machine guns. He performed this feat while armed with only an automatic revolver and a Springfield rifle. His action, termed by Marshal Foch "the greatest thing accomplished by any private soldier of all the armies of Europe," brought him the Congressional Medal of Honor and the Croix de Guerre. He was presented with a farm, the funds for which were raised by public contributions; and the York Foundation for the schooling of mountain children was organized in his name.

York, House of. Branch of the English royal dynasty of Plantagenet, descended (through the female line) from Lionel, Duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III, and Edmund, Duke of York, fifth son of Edward III; it opposed its claim to that of the House of Lancaster, whose claim derived from John of Gaunt, fourth son of Edward III. The head of the house was Richard, 3rd Duke of York (killed 1460). His sons Edward IV and Richard III, and grandson Edward V, were kings of England (1461-85) during the period of the Wars of the Roses. The descendants of Edward IV's brother (George, Duke of Clarence) and sister (Elizabeth) became claimants after 1485; Henry VII, however, married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV, and, being himself a descendant of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, thus united the claims of the warring houses. The last serious claimant was Richard de la Pole (died 1525).

Yorke (yôrk), Philip. [Title, 1st Earl of Hardwicke.] b. at Dover, England, Dec. 1, 1690; d. at London, March 6, 1764. English judge. He was a member of Parliament (1719, 1722-34), solicitor general (1720), attorney general (1724), chief justice and privy counselor (1733), and lord chancellor (1737-56). He was responsible for the attainder clauses in the act of 1744 making correspondence with the Pretender (James Francis Edward Stuart) or his brothers high treason, and for legislative measures abolishing heritable jurisdictions and forbidding the tartan in Scotland.

Yorke, Philip. [Title, 2nd Earl of Hardwicke.] b. March 19, 1720; d. at London, May 16, 1790. English author and politician. He was a member of Parliament (1741-64) and a member (1764 et seq.) of the House of Lords. He served as high steward (1764-90) of Cambridge University. He was coauthor, with his brother, of the Athenian Letters, or the Epistolary Correspondence of an Agent of the King of Persia Residing at Athens during the Peloponnesian War (privately printed, 1741; published 1798), a work treating historical events and characters in a fictional but realistic manner. Exceedingly popular in its day, it went through several editions, was twice translated into French, and was published in pirated editions.

Yorke, Stephen. Pseudonym of Linskill, Mary.

York House. Former palace in London, situated on the Strand W of Salisbury House and the Savoy; a town residence of the archbishops of York after Wolsey. It should not be confused with York Place. The only archbishop who actually resided here was Nicholas Heath, Queen Mary's chancellor. It became the official residence of chancellors and keepers of the great seal; hence Sir Nicholas Bacon went to reside there and Francis Bacon was born there. George Villiers, 1st Duke of Buckingham, obtained the property from James I, and proposed to build a palace from the designs of Inigo Jones; only the water gate was built.

York Place. Name formerly given to Whitehall Palace, London.

York Plays or Mysteries. Cycle of 48 plays performed by the Crafts or Mysteries of York, England, on Corpus Christi Day, in the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. The earliest mention of them is in 1376, when they had already been established some years. The plays, the largest extant English cycle and covering Biblical history from the creation to judgment day, were printed in 1885 by Lucy Toulmin Smith from the unique manuscripts, dating from 1475, in the library of Lord Ashburnham. The best known of the plays is the Noah episode, where the shrewish wife argues about getting into the ark and eventually strikes him.

York River. Estuary in E Virginia. It receives the Pamunkey River and flows into Chesapeake Bay. Length, ab. 40 mi.

Yorkshire (yôrk'shir) or York (yôrk). County in N central and NE England, the largest county in England. It is divided into the three administrative counties (called "ridings" in Yorkshire) of the North Riding, the East Riding, and the West Riding, of which the West Riding is the largest and the East Riding is the smallest. Yorkshire is bounded on the N by Durham, on the E by the North Sea, on the S by Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire, and on the W by Lancashire and Westmorland. It is traversed in the W by the Pennines, and its surface is greatly diversified. It has important mines of coal, iron, and other minerals; flourishing agriculture, especially in the Vale of York, Cleveland, and Holderness; and manufactures of woollens, worsted, iron, and steel, among others. It contains the large towns of Leeds, Sheffield, Hull, Bradford, York (the historical "capital" of Yorkshire, and separate from the three Ridings), Huddersfield, and Halifax. It has a number of seaside resorts and seaports. Yorkshire belonged to the Brigantes, after the Roman occupation formed the kingdom of Deira and part of Northumbria, and was the scene of numerous Scottish raids, of battles in the Wars of the Roses, of the "Pilgrimage of Grace" in 1536, of an insurrection in 1569, and of the battle of Marston Moor in 1644. Area, ab. 5,794 sq. mi.; pop. 4,516,362 (1951).

Yorkshire, East Riding of (rī'ding). Administrative county of Yorkshire, in NE England. It is bounded on the N by the North Riding, on the E by the North Sea, on the S by Lincolnshire, and on the SW and W by the West Riding. The county is traversed from N to S by the Wolds, a series of uplands. West of the Wolds is the Vale of York, an important wheat-raising area. Barley, oats, and root crops are also raised here, as well as cattle. East of the Wolds is the Holderness peninsula, a flat, drained region where the raising of wheat, cattle, and root crops is important. Sheep are raised on the Wolds. Industry is centered principally at Beverly and at Hull (also a great seaport). Marine engines are made at Hull. There are seaside resorts at Bridlington, Hornsea, and Withernsea. The East Riding is the smallest of the three Ridings. County seat, Beverly; area, ab. 1,150 sq. mi.; pop. 510,800 (1951).

Yorkshire, North Riding of. Administrative county of Yorkshire, in NE England. It is bounded on the N by Durham, on the E by the North Sea, on the S by the East Riding and the city of York, on the SW by the West Riding, and on the W by Westmorland. It has upland moors in the W and NE parts, separated by the Vale of York, which here follows the valleys of the rivers Swale and Ure. The N part may be considered part of Northumbria (in the basin of the lower river Tees). Wheat, barley, oats, and root crops, as well as fodder grasses, are raised here. Cattle and poultry are important in this region. The Vale of York is an important wheat-raising region. Iron is extensively mined in the Cleveland Hills, having first been mined by the Romans and then abandoned until its rediscovery c1850. The North Riding formerly had extensive lead mining, but this activity is now extinct. There is an important iron and steel industry at Middlesbrough. Seaside resorts are located at Saltburn, Whitby, and Scarborough. Alum and jet are mined at Whitby. Northallerton is the county seat; area, ab. 2,116 sq. mi.; pop. 525,496 (1951).

Yorkshire, West Riding of. Administrative county of Yorkshire, in C England. It is bounded on the N by the North Riding, on the E by the North Riding, the East Riding, and Lincolnshire, on the SE by Nottinghamshire, on the S by Derbyshire, on the SW by Cheshire, on the W by Lancashire, and on the NW by Westmorland. The surface is mountainous in the W and NW parts, rising to 2,414 ft. in Whenside Mountain. The E part is generally low, containing part of the Vale of York, an important agricultural region. The West Riding is an important industrial county, the center of the woolen-textile industry. It leads in worsted manufactures. Some of the important industrial towns are Bradford, Doncaster, Huddersfield, Leeds, Selby, and Sheffield. Besides woollens, the county has iron and steel manufactures, chemical manufactures, and large oil refineries (at Selby). Goole is a seaport and shipbuilding center. The county has an important coal field and there is much coal mining here. The West Riding is the largest of the three Ridings. The county seat is Wakefield; area, ab. 2,350 sq. mi.; pop. 3,480,066 (1951).

Yorktown. Town in SE Virginia, county seat of York County, situated on the York River ab. 50 mi. SE of Richmond. Here in 1781 the British under General Charles Cornwallis were besieged by the allied Americans and French under George Washington and Count Rochambeau, aided by the French fleet under Count F. J. P. de Grasse. Yorktown was invested by the end of September; the first parallel was established October 9; an unsuccessful sortie was made October 16; and the British (ab. 8,000) surrendered October 19. This event virtually closed the Revolutionary War. Here also occurred, during the Civil War, the siege of the Confederates under J. B. Magruder, and later under Joseph Johnston, by the Army of the Potomac under G. B. McClellan. It was begun April 5, 1862, and Yorktown was evacuated by the Confederates on May 4. Pop. 384 (1950).

Yorktown. U.S. aircraft carrier, the chief American casualty in the naval encounter (June 4-7, 1942) at Midway, in the C Pacific Ocean. Planes, which played a vital role in the battle, took off from the carrier's decks but were unable to return because of the damage inflicted on the vessel in battle. The Yorktown sank while an attempt was being made to tow her away from the engagement.

Yoruba (yō'rō.bā; yō'rū.bā). [Also: Anago, Nagot, Yarriba.] Sudanic-speaking people of W Africa, inhabiting SW Nigeria and E Dahomey. They are divided into some 20 independent kingdoms which do not coincide exactly with their cultural and linguistic subgroups. These subgroups are the Oyo, Egba, Iketu, Ohori, Egbado, Ijebu, Ife, Ijesha, Igboina, Ondo, and Ekiti. They have exogamous patrilineal clans, and they practice hoe agriculture. Their principal foods are maize and yams. The Yoruba have spread throughout Nigeria and into neighboring French colonies as clerks, and along the coast from Dakar to the mouth of the Congo River as traders, often being mistaken for Hausa. Yoruba groups (known as Aku) in Freetown and Bathurst are descended from slaves who were freed and set ashore in the latter part of the 18th century after American slave ships had been intercepted by the British blockade, but far more Yoruba slaves reached the Americas, where they are known as Lucumi (or Locomi) and Nago. Obatala, Shango, Eshu, Oshun, Shopona, Yemoja, Ifa, and other Yoruba deities are important in the Afro-Cuban and Afro-Brazilian cults and are known also in other parts of the world. The Yoruba number more than 3,500,000.

Yosemite National Park (yōsem'it.tē). National park in E central California, in the Sierra Nevada. Its central feature is Yosemite Valley, ab. 7 mi. long by 1 mi. wide, formed by the Merced River and by glacial action, which, at an elevation above sea level of ab. 4,000 ft., is surrounded by sheer monolithic granite peaks (many with rounded tops and known as "domes") rising some 4,000 ft. more above the valley floor; best known of these are probably El Capitan (elevation ab. 7,564 ft.) and Half Dome (ab. 8,852 ft.). Peaks of the Sierras rise further to ab. 13,000 ft. above sea level and from the high valleys and mountain meadows tributaries of the Merced River flow over the sheer valley walls in spectacular waterfalls such as Bridal Veil (ab. 620 ft.) and Yosemite Falls (two falls and a series of cascades totaling over 2,500 ft.). The park also contains three groves of giant redwoods (sequoias), a museum, a model Indian village, hotels, campsites, and ski slopes, as well as many miles of trails and automobile roads. The name Yosemite, taken from an Indian word for "grizzly bear," was also that of a tribe of Indians who occupied the region; reports of a band of soldiers who had followed some of these Indians were probably the first published accounts (1851) of the now famous valley. Among those whose efforts led to the establishment of the park were James M. Hutchings and John Muir, explorers and writers, and Josiah Dwight Whitney, geologist. Yosemite Valley became a California state park in 1866, a national reserve was added around it in 1890, and the two were consolidated in 1906. Area, ab. 1,182 sq. mi.

Young, Brigham. b. at Whitingham, Vt., June 1, 1801; d. at Salt Lake City, Utah, Aug. 29, 1877. American Mormon leader, president of the Mormon Church. In early life he was by trade a carpenter, painter, and glazier at Mendon, N.Y., a few miles from Palmyra, where Joseph Smith published the Book of Mormon in 1830. He was converted to Mormonism in 1831, was baptized and began to preach in 1832, and in that year joined the Mormons at Kirtland, Ohio. He was made an elder in 1832 and an apostle in 1835, served as a missionary in England (1839-41), and was chosen president of the church as successor to Smith in 1844. He conducted the emigration from Nauvoo, Ill., to Utah (1846-48), was elected governor of the Mormon state of Deseret in 1849, and was appointed governor of Utah Territory by President Fillmore. In 1852 he proclaimed the doctrine of polygamy. He defied the U.S. government, and was removed from the governorship by President Buchanan. Young remained nevertheless the leader of the Mormons and was instrumental in preventing their complete suppression by the U.S. government, resisting force (1857-58) but carrying on diplomatic negotiations when possible. In 1871 he was indicted for polygamy, but was not convicted. At his death he had 17 surviving wives. He was said to be head of the secret order of Danites.

Yucatán (yô'ka.tan'; Spanish, yô.ká.tán'). Peninsula in SE Mexico, British Honduras, and N Guatemala. It is bounded on the W by the Gulf of Campeche, on the N by the Gulf of Mexico, on the E by the Caribbean Sea, and on the SE by the Gulf of Honduras. It is a lowland, and a large part of it is rather dry, as it is underlain by porous limestones and has no surface streams whatever; water is obtained by the inhabitants from deep open wells or pools called cenotes. There are extensive sisal plantations in N Yucatán. A large proportion of the inhabitants are Mayas, and the region is famous for its ruins, including Uxmal, Kabah, Chichén-Itzá, and Aké. The coast of Yucatán was discovered May 4, 1517, in the course of a voyage of adventure from Cuba; it was conquered by the Spaniards (1527-47), became independent in 1821, was annexed to Mexico in 1822, and was independent 1840-43.

Yucatán. State in SE Mexico, occupying the N part of the peninsula of Yucatán. Capital, Mérida; area, 14,868 sq. mi.; pop. 515,256 (1950).

Yudenich (yô.dya'nich), Nikolai Nikolayevich. b. July 18, 1862; d. at Paris, 1933. Russian soldier. Entering the Russian army in his youth, he held high rank during the Russo-Japanese War, and had advanced to a lieutenant-generalship before the outbreak of World War I, during which he was in command of Russian forces in the Caucasus. After the Russian Revolution of 1917 he organized a counterrevolutionary army which, operating from Estonia, in October, 1919, advanced against Petrograd, but was turned back, and Yudenich went into exile.

Yudin (yô'dyin), Sergei Sergeevich. b. in Russia, 1891—. Russian surgeon. His name has been linked with many innovations in surgery. He developed a technique of radical resection of perforated and bleeding gastric ulcers and used successfully fresh cadaver blood instead of donor blood for transfusion after he found that no changes occur in the blood for eight to ten hours following death.

Yuen (yü.an'). See Yuan.

Yugoslavia (yô'gō.sls'vī.ə). [Also: Jugoslavija; official Serbo-Croatian name, Federativna Narodna Republika Jugoslavija, meaning "Federal People's Republic of the South Slavs (Yugoslavia)."] Country in SE Europe, bounded by Austria and Hungary on the N, Rumania on the NE, Bulgaria on the E, Greece on the S, Albania on the SW, the Adriatic Sea on the W, and the Free Territory of Trieste and Italy on the NW. It includes a combination of various territories which were previously either independent or under Turkish, Hungarian, Austrian, or Italian rule.

Population and Area. The country suffered a population loss of ab. 1,750,000 persons during World War II. Capital, Belgrade; area, 99,182 sq. mi.; pop. 15,772,098 (1948).

Terrain and Climate. Yugoslavia falls into three main regions, the N lowlands, the corridor lands of E Serbia, and the country of the Dinaric foothills, each containing numerous subdivisions. The N lowlands, economically the most developed part of the country, are bounded on the NW by the SE ranges and foothills of the Alps, while on the NE there is no geographical barrier separating them from the Hungarian plain. The Sava, Drava, Danube, and Tisza are the main rivers. The second region comprises the Morava and Vardar river basins, the political core of the country. The third region includes the mountainous and therefore the least densely populated section; the E part of the region is forested, while the W part, stretching along the Adriatic coast from which the bulk of the country is thus separated, has suffered erosion. The climate shows wide diversity. In the NW, central European conditions prevail, with hot summers and cold winters; the Croatian and Dalmatian coast has a Mediterranean climate comparable to that of Italy, but in the larger part of the country the climate is continental in character, with cold winters and hot summers. The mountains in the S have cool summers, while the hottest summers are experienced in the steppelike plains bordering on S Hungary.

Agriculture, Industry, and Trade. About 75 percent of the population is engaged in agriculture. Of the total area ab. 31 percent is forested, 30 percent is arable, and 25 percent is in pasture. The chief agricultural areas are concentrated in the plains and river basins of the N, with maize (corn) and wheat the principal products. Stock raising is more evenly spread, with sheep prevailing in the mountainous regions and cattle and pigs in the plains of Croatia, Slavonia, and the Vojvodina. In the same region are vineyards and orchards, the latter planted chiefly with plum trees. Mediterranean products are grown on the Adriatic coast; tobacco, hemp, and other crops are grown in various parts of the country, with a concentration in Macedonia. In the late 1940's far-reaching agrarian reforms were enacted. Yugoslavia has considerable mineral resources such as coal, iron, copper, gold, lead, chrome, antimony, and bauxite. Since the annexation of Istria, Yugoslavia has been ranked as the largest bauxite-producing country of Europe. Industry, aside from food processing and textile manufacture, is comparatively undeveloped. There is Yugoslav shipping on the Mediterranean and on the Danube.

Government and History. The present constitution was adopted by the national assembly on Jan. 31, 1946. It provides for six member republics, or federative units, namely Serbia (Srbija), Croatia (Hrvatska), Slovenia (Slovenija), Bosnia-Herzegovina (Bosna i Hercegovina), Montenegro (Crna Gora), and Macedonia (Makedonija). The autonomous provinces of Vojvodina and Kosovo-Metohija are included in the federative unit of Serbia. Parliament is composed of two chambers. It elects a presidium, with the president of the presidium being the head of the state. However, as the chief of the dominant party, the president actually holds a position which is independent of the parliament. The constitution enfranchises women, separates church and state, and in its economic provisions shows the general characteristics of the "people's democracies" of E Europe; it provides for the breaking up of large estates and the placing of foreign trade under state control. The government of Yugoslavia after World War II was headed by Marshal Tito (Josip Broz). The earlier history of Yugoslavia is treated under entries on the federative units, or the historical divisions of the country. The United Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (named Yugoslavia in 1929) came into being after the conclusion of World War I. Nine banoine (provinces) were established in place of the historical divisions. King Alexander announced the establishment of a royal dictatorship in 1931; the king was assassinated at Marseilles in 1934.

In 1941 the cabinet of Prince Paul, the regent and a cousin of the late king, was prepared to yield to Hitler's pressure and to ally the country with Germany in World War II, but the cabinet was overthrown, young King Peter II, Alexander's son, was installed and, on April 6, 1941, Hitler declared war and invaded the country. Yugoslavia was to be divided between Italy and Germany, with Italy receiving the coastal areas and Germany occupying the interior. The Duke of Spoleto became king of Croatia and that part of the country joined the Axis. A Yugoslav government-in-exile was formed at London, and General Draža Mihailovich was encouraged to resist the Germans and Italians in the mountain areas. However, the cautious operations of General Mihailovich were soon challenged by militant groups of partisans under the leadership of Josip Broz (Marshal Tito). These groups were, for the most part, Communist-dominated. They gained the support of the peasantry and in 1944 a royal decree deprived Mihailovich of his command. He continued his opposition to Tito until he was executed in 1946. At the same time, the monarchy was abolished and the People's Republic was established along Communist lines. As a result of World War II, Yugoslavia acquired the Italian territories along the E Adriatic coast, including Istria, but did not gain Trieste. Likewise, her claims to parts of the Austrian province of Carinthia found no international support.

Culture and Religion. Yugoslavia shows the greatest diversity of all the countries of Europe. Various Slavic dialects are spoken, with the Serbo-Croatian dialect developing as a lingua franca. However, the Slovenian and Macedonian dialects are also officially recognized. Culturally as well as historically, one part of the country belongs to Western Europe, the other to Eastern Europe. The W parts, namely Croatia (including Dalmatia) and Slovenia (including Istria), adhere to the Roman Catholic faith while the E parts (Serbia, Bosnia-Hercegovina, Montenegro, and Macedonia) adhere to the Serbian Orthodox faith, a national subdivision of the Greek Orthodox Church. Accordingly, the Latin alphabet is used in the W parts, the Cyrillic alphabet in the E parts. In the SE part there are large Mohammedan minorities, particularly in Bosnia-Hercegovina and in Macedonia. According to the census of 1931, 48.7 percent of the population were of the Serbian Orthodox faith, 37.5 percent Roman Catholics, 11.2 percent Mohammedans, and there were smaller groups of Greek Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and others. The Serbian Orthodox Church is ruled by a patriarch and a synod. The E parts of the country were for centuries under Hapsburg rule, either in Austria or in Hungary, or, as on the coast, under Venetian sovereignty which was finally superseded by Hapsburg rule. The Turks did not penetrate into Montenegro and permitted the city of Dubrovnik to remain practically independent under Venetian protection, thus providing a shelter for Slavic literature. The modern literature of the southern Slavs developed in the 19th century under the influence of the Romantic Movement. The peasant culture of the country had to assert itself against the imposition of feudal institutions by foreign overlords. Today there are three state universities.

Yugoslavs (yô'gô.slàvz). People of Yugoslavia, comprised of four ethnic groups: Croats, Serbs, Slovenes, and Macedonians.

Yugakghirs (yô'kă.girz). [Also, Oduly.] People of NE Siberia with primitive hunting and fishing culture, speaking a Hyperborean language.

Yukawa (yô.kă.wă), Hideki. b. at Tokyo, Jan. 23, 1907—. Japanese physicist, winner (1949) of the Nobel prize in physics. He lectured on physics at Kyoto University in 1932, was an assistant professor of that science at Osaka University (1933-39), and in 1939 returned to Kyoto as full professor, in that year also traveling around the world lecturing on theoretical physics. As early as 1933 he inferred the existence of a subatomic particle, smaller than a proton and larger than an electron, "in between matter and energy," which would account for certain observed phenomena involving the atomic nucleus. He made his theory public in 1935, and its verification by physicists in Europe and America brought him world-wide fame in scientific circles. The newly disclosed particle was given the name "meson" or "mesotron," and its presence was later discovered in cosmic rays. After World War II it was found that the results of Yukawa's further experiments and the results of further research in Western countries were in accord. In 1948 Hideki Yukawa accepted an invitation to join the Institute for Advanced Studies at Princeton, N.J., and in 1949-50 he was visiting professor of physics at Columbia University in New York City.

Yuki (yô'ki). North American Indian language family, comprising the languages of three small tribes formerly inhabiting the inland area of W central California.

Yuki (yô'kê). Japanese name of Unggi.

Yukon (yô'kon). Territory in NW Canada, bounded on the N by the Beaufort Sea, on the W by Alaska, on the S by British Columbia, and on the E by Mackenzie district, Northwest Territories. It was organized in 1898 at the time of the Klondike gold rush. It sends to the Dominion Parliament one representative, and is governed by a controller (subject to and appointed by the dominion government), who is assisted by an elected council of three. Dawson is the chief town. The only other important settlement in the territory is Whitehorse, in the S part, which is connected by rail with Skagway in Alaska and by the Alaska Highway with Edmonton. Mining is the chief industry in the territory, and large quantities of gold and silver are produced. Capital, Dawson; area, 207,076 sq. mi. (including 1,730 sq. mi. of water); 9,096 (1951).

Yukon River. River which rises in British Columbia, Canada, flows NW, W, and SW, and empties into Bering Sea, after traversing Alaska. Length, ab. 1,979 mi.; navigable ab. 1,200 mi.

Yule (yôl), Sir Henry. b. near Edinburgh, in May, 1820; d. at London, Dec. 30, 1889. British military engineer in India, and Orientalist. Among his works are A Narrative of the Mission Sent to the Court of Ava (1858); he was secretary of this mission, Cathay and the Way Thither (1866), a translation of Marco Polo (2 vols., 1871; revised ed., 1875), articles on Central Asia and the Chinese empire, with A. C. Burnell Hobson-Jobson; Being a Glossary of Anglo-Indian Colloquial Words and Phrases (1886), and notes to the Hakluyt Society's reprint of the diary of William Hedges (1887).

Yuma (yô'mă). Tribe of North American Indians, formerly of SW Arizona. Today ab. 1,000 survive on reservations in California.

Yuma. City in SW Arizona, county seat of Yuma County, on the California border near the confluence of the Colorado and Gila rivers, in an irrigated citrus-fruit, cotton, vegetable, and alfalfa producing region. 9,145 (1950).

In lower Zagreb, which is the new city, are the educational institutions, such as the University of Croatia (opened in 1874), schools of technology and commerce, and an academy of music. The city is a commercial center, particularly for the wine and grain trade, and has an annual fair. There are leather, textile, wood, and paper industries, tobacco-processing factories, and sugar refiner's. The city was founded in 1093 and destroyed by the Mongols in 1242. Once an important stronghold against the Turks, it is now the focus of Croatian cultural life. It was the seat of a German-Italian puppet government during World War II. 290,417 (1948).

Zagreus (zā'grē.us). Divine child of Orphic mythology, later identified with Dionysus. The story is that Zeus, in serpent form, begat Zagreus on Persephone, and intended to bestow on him unlimited power. Hera, in jealousy, induced the Titans to do away with the boy. First they beguiled him to them with toys, then killed and devoured him. Athena managed to save the child's heart; this Zeus swallowed and thus was enabled to rebegot Zagreus in the new Dionysus, son of Semele.

Zaharoff (zā.hā'rof), Sir Basil. b. in Anatolia, Turkey, 1849; d. 1936. International financier and munitions expert, recognized in his lifetime as one of the world's wealthiest men. He contributed heavily to the Greeks during the Balkan Wars, and to the French and British in World War I. Among other large beneficiaries were the American Near East Relief Fund, the French "save the franc fund," several university chairs, and Greek refugee charities. He was an intimate of David Lloyd George, Georges Clemenceau, Aristide Briand, and Eleutherios Venizelos, and is said to have exerted influence during World War I and on the peace negotiations. Much has been said of the malign influence Zaharoff supposedly exerted in international affairs as representative of the great armaments manufacturers, Vickers, Krupp, Schneider-Creusot, Skoda, but in part, at least, this is due to his retiring, hence mysterious, way of living.

Zenger (zeng'ēr), John Peter. b. in Germany, 1697; d. July 28, 1746. American printer and publisher. He was brought to America at the age of 13, and in 1726 established a printing business at New York. In 1734 he was arrested and tried (1735) for libel because of the criticisms which appeared in his paper, the New York Weekly Journal, on the occasion of the removal from office of Chief Justice Lewis Morris by Governor William Cosby. The defense was conducted by Andrew Hamilton of Philadelphia and resulted in the acquittal of Zenger, despite the attempts of the court to persuade the jury that its judgment should not extend to the libelousness of the statements; the jury decided that it was as competent to decide on the existence of the libel as on its publication. The decision is regarded as a landmark in establishing the freedom of the press in America. He published A Brief Narrative of the Case and Trial of John Peter Zenger (1736), became (1737) public printer for the colony of New York, and in 1738 was named to the same post for the colony of New Jersey. He edited the Weekly Journal until the time of his death.

Zenkoji (zen.kō.jē). Ancient name of Nagano.

Zeno (zē'nō). [Also, Zeno of Elea.] Lived in the 5th cent. b.c. Greek philosopher of the Eleatic school, the favorite pupil of Parmenides. He went to Athens in his fortieth year, during the early youth of Socrates, and resided there many years. He is especially celebrated for his arguments designed to prove the inconsistency in the concepts of divisibility. Zeno's paradoxes were notable advances in the theory of infinity. The best known is his paradox of Achilles and the turtle: If the turtle be given a start, Achilles can never catch him since by the time Achilles reaches the point where the tortoise was the tortoise will have moved, and so on. Another has to do with an arrow in flight; at any moment the arrow occupies a given position and is therefore at rest; it is thus at rest during the whole flight. His doctrines are referred to in the Parmenides of Plato.

Zeno. b. at Citium, in Cyprus; d. c264 b.c. Greek philosopher, founder of the Stoic school of philosophy. He studied philosophy under the Cynics at Athens, and founded his school, eclectic in its efforts to reach a consistent system, there at the Stoa Poecile ("Painted Porch"), whence its name.

Zeno. b. at Sidon, in Phoenicia, c150 b.c.; d. c78 b.c. Epicurean philosopher at Athens, instructor of Cicero.

Zeno. fl. 5th century A.D. Byzantine emperor (474-491). He was an Isaurian by birth, and was son-in-law of the emperor Leo I. Soon after his accession he was forced from the throne for almost two years by the usurper Basiliscus, and during this period the western empire fell (476) to the barbarians. Zeno made a treaty with the Vandal Genseric, and recognized the rule of Odoacer in the west, but found that the raids of the Ostrogoths in the east became increasingly annoying. These he ended by inducing Theodoric the Great to invade Italy in 488. In the Monophysite controversy, Zeno promulgated the Henoticon (482), a letter attempting to settle the differences between eastern and western church practices, but the suggested compromise served only to deepen the argument.

Zeno (dzä'nō), Antonio. fl. about the end of the 14th century. Venetian navigator; brother of Niccolò Zeno.

Zeno, Niccolò. b. c1343; d. c1395. Venetian explorer. He is said to have visited Greenland, Newfoundland, and the coast of North America. A narrative of his discoveries, with map, was published by Carlo Zeno in 1558 (edited by the Hakluyt Society in 1873).

Zenobia (zē.nō'bi.ə). d. after 274 A.D. Queen of Palmyra; wife of Odenathus, ruler of Palmyra. She was joint ruler in her husband's lifetime, and succeeded him (c267) as regent for her son and as queen. Under the cloak of a Roman alliance, she stationed her armies throughout the East, in Asia Minor, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt; on Aurelian's accession, she openly defied Rome. Her armies were defeated by Aurelian in 271, Palmyra was besieged and taken in 272, and she was captured and brought to Rome to grace Aurelian's triumph. She was afterward pensioned and given an estate by the Romans.

Zenobia. Impulsive, passionate woman who drowns herself, in The Blithedale Romance (1852), novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne. She is believed to be in part drawn from Margaret Fuller.

Zeus (zōs). In Greek mythology, king of the gods, the supreme deity, omnipresent and all-powerful, generally looked upon as the son of Cronus and Rhea, and held to have dethroned and succeeded his father. Specifically, he was a sky god and controlled all celestial phenomena, as rains, snows, and tempests, heat and cold, thunder and lightning. His sister and consort was Hera. Zeus was worshipped widely in Greece, but the most renowned of his sanctuaries were those of Olympia in Elis and Dodona in Epirus. By numerous paramours he was the father of Athena, the Horae, the Moirae, the Muses, and the Graces. He was the father of the twin gods Apollo and Artemis, of Ares, Hermes, Hebe, Aphrodite, and Persephone. Among the many heroes fathered by Zeus were Hercules, Perseus, and the twin heroes Castor and Pollux. The oak and the eagle were sacred to him. The Romans identified their Jupiter with Zeus, and the Zeus myths became an accretion to the ancient Jupiter mythology.

Zhdanov (zhdā'nōf). [Former name, Mariupol.] Seaport, situated on the N shore of the Sea of Azov: the chief port serving the Donets Basin. It has traffic in coal, iron ore, grain, and salt. It has an important iron and steel industry and also has shipyards, and machinery, chemical, and fish-canning industries. The city suffered extensive damage in World War II when it was occupied by the Germans from October, 1941, to September, 1943. Pop. 222,427 (1939).

Zhdanov, Andrei Aleksandrovich. b. at Mariupol (now Zhdanov), in the Ukraine, Feb. 12, 1896; d. Aug. 31, 1948. Russian political leader and soldier. He joined the Bolshevik wing of the Russian Social-Democratic Party in his youth, and after the assassination of Sergei Kirov, secretary of the Communist Party at Leningrad, Zhdanov in 1934 was appointed to that post and made an alternate member of the Politburo, later becoming a full member of that body. He was the strategist of the campaign against Finland (1939-40), and with Marshal Voroshilov directed the defense of Leningrad against the German besiegers (1941-43). He was head of the Allied Control Commission for Finland (1944-47), during this time becoming (1946) general secretary of the All-Union Communist Party and chairman of the Supreme Soviet. In October, 1947, he announced the formation of the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform), which was recognized as a rebirth of the former Communist International (Comintern), for the correlation of activities and policies of communist parties in various countries. He became head of this organization, of which he was perhaps the chief architect. Always a strict party disciplinarian, and unhesitatingly resolute in enforcing what he believed to be sound Marxist policy, even to the extent of dictating to musical composers, writers, and artists how they should serve the cause, he also believed firmly in the necessity of centralized control of communist activities in all countries from Moscow. This policy was successful in most directions, but some critics pointed out that the severity of its application was the cause of schisms, most notably in driving Yugoslavia out of the Soviet bloc. Prior to his death, it was widely supposed that Zhdanov was the most likely potential successor to Joseph Stalin as the most powerful figure in the Soviet state.

Zhidovskii gorod (zhi.dōf'ski gō'rot). Russian name of Chufut-Kale.

Zhukov (zhō'kof), Georgi Konstantinovich. b. at Strelkova, Russia, c1895-. Russian marshal. A soldier in the czar's army during World War I, he joined the revolutionary forces in 1917. Subsequently he studied at the Frunze Military Academy for Red Army officers, specializing in tank strategy and tactics. During the Spanish Civil War (1936-39) he was for a time an adviser on tank warfare to the Loyalist forces, but the Japanese-Russian imbroglio (1938-39) along the Manchurian-Mongolian border found him in command of tank units which surrounded and utterly routed the Japanese forces. Again he was in charge of tank operations in the short war with Finland (1939-40). Promoted to a full general and, in February, 1941, appointed chief of staff and vice-commissioner of defense, he set about increasing the mobility of the Red Army, an achievement which contributed to that army's ability to absorb the German attack in June, 1941. In October of that year Zhukov took command of the Russian forces defending Moscow, and so conducted their retreat that by December he was able to take the initiative away from the Germans and launch a strong counterattack. Given command on the southwestern front, he directed the operations which cut off and compelled the eventual surrender of the Germans attacking Stalingrad. He also collaborated with Voroshilov and Zhdanov in raising, in January, 1943, the 17-month siege of Leningrad. Advanced to the rank of marshal in 1943, Zhukov became deputy commander in chief under Marshal Stalin, who reposed great confidence in him, and took active command of the final campaign of the war. Beginning in March, 1944, the Red Army drove the invaders out of Russian territory; in January, 1945, they swept into Germany on an 800-mile front; on May 2 they entered Berlin. On May 8 Marshal Zhukov was one of the Allied signatories of the terms of the German surrender. Thereafter he commanded the Soviet occupation forces in Germany until February, 1946, when he became chief of the ground forces of the Red Army; in 1947 he was appointed to command of the Odessa military area.

Zinoviev (zē.nōv'yif), Grigory Evseyevich. b. at Elisavetgrad (Kirovograd), Russia, in September, 1883; d. in August, 1936. Russian political leader. While a student at Bern in Switzerland, he became a revolutionary and, under the influence of Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, joined the Bolshevik faction of the Russian Social-Democratic Party in 1903. Returning to Russia in 1906, he became a member of the central committee of the Bolshevik-controlled Social-Democratic Party in St. Petersburg; after the dismissal of the first Duma in that year, he attempted to organize a revolt at the naval base of Kronstadt; he edited radical newspapers, was arrested in 1908, and upon his release went into exile. With Lenin in 1912 he established in Galicia a base of operations for propaganda among the Russian proletariat and for the guidance of Bolshevik activities in general. After the outbreak of World War I he collaborated with Lenin in antiwar propaganda and, at the Zimmerwald Conference in 1915, in the organization of the Communist International (Comintern). With Lenin also he returned to Russia after the establishment of the provisional government in 1917, edited radical papers in opposition to the Kerensky regime, and participated in the Bolshevik triumph in October. In 1919 he became head of the Comintern, and after Lenin's death in 1924 he, Stalin, and Kamenyev formed the triumvirate which took over power. In 1925, however, he and Kamenyev joined Leon Trotsky in what Stalin denounced as a deviation from Leninism. In 1926 he was deposed from the Politburo, and in 1927 expelled from the Communist Party. Renouncing his deviationism, he was taken back into the party in 1929, but never recovered his former influence. In 1934 the U.S.S.R. was shaken by the assassination of Sergei Mironovich Kirov, secretary of the Communist Party at Leningrad, and Zinoviev was among those arrested on suspicion of complicity. He was subsequently released, but in 1936 was again arrested, charged with plotting, in collaboration with Trotsky, Kamenyev, and others, to assassinate Stalin and overthrow the existing regime. At a public trial he confessed guilt on all counts of the indictment and was convicted and executed, 14 other alleged conspirators sharing his fate. The notorious "Zinoviev Letter" was a forged document, supposedly of his authorship while he was head of the Comintern, giving instructions for a Communist revolution in England. Published by several English newspapers, it led to the defeat of the Labour Party in the elections of 1924.

He was educated at Halle and Wittenberg, was in the Saxon civil service (1721-27), and then settled on his estate at Berthelsdorf. He established a colony of the persecuted Moravian Brethren at Herrnhut, and reorganized the church. He was expelled from Saxony for his activities in 1736, but was allowed to return in 1748. He was made a bishop of the Moravian Church, and traveled extensively in Europe and North America, establishing congregations at Bethlehem and other places in Pennsylvania (1741-43). He wrote sermons, hymns, and polemics.

Zion (zī'ōn). City in NE Illinois, in Lake County, on Lake Michigan: manufactures of wicker furniture. 8,950 (1950).

Zion, Mount. [Also, Mount Zion.] Hill on which was situated the old city of Jerusalem; the "city of David." The name was probably given originally to the lower city, and then transferred to Mount Moriah, the Temple hill. It has also been applied to the upper city, and to Jerusalem as a whole, to Palestine, and symbolically to the spiritual hope of Israel and to the Christian church and heaven.

Zionism (zī'ōn.iz.əm). Jewish nationalist movement whose basic program envisions the establishment of a national home for the Jews, who otherwise would live entirely as a minority people in other nations of the world. It takes its name from Mount Zion, a hill at Jerusalem, whose name, even in Biblical times, was applied to the whole of Palestine and its inhabitants. The roots of Zionism go back to the several forcible dispersals of the Jews from their home in Palestine; after the scattering of the Jewish nation following the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. and the crushing of the revolt of Bar Kochba (132 A.D.), the Jews, though united by a common religious belief and by national customs, had no homeland. Unwanted by the peoples among whom they lived, persecuted, forced to live as an unprotected minority, they cherished the ideal of a return to the land of Israel. Messianic movements arose among them several times, luring them back to a land long since settled by others, but none of these succeeded in obtaining official recognition and, beyond keeping alive the spark of nationalist feeling, were failures. Assimilationist tendencies, notably as a result of the efforts of Moses Mendelssohn, and directed toward the breaking down of the barriers between the cultures of the Jews and their neighbors, had only limited results; outbreaks of anti-Semitism, particularly a wave of persecutions that swept eastern Europe in the 1880's, had the effect of negating any positive gains. In 1896 the publication of The Jewish State by Theodor Herzl gave a focus to the nationalist hopes by indicating that there was some hope of establishing a Jewish state in Palestine under Turkish rule. In 1897 the first Zionist congress met at Basel, Switzerland, and thenceforth the movement took definite direction. The offer, made by the British in 1903, of a national home in east Africa met with some approval, but majority opinion still held for Palestine. Migration to Palestine, in small numbers, had been going on for some time, but the rise of Turkish nationalism put an end to hopes for sympathetic hearing of the Zionist cause by the Turkish government. When Turkey entered World War I on the side of the Central Powers, the Zionists and the British government came to an agreement; in 1917 the Balfour Declaration, issued by the British foreign secretary, was made, stating in part: "His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people." In 1920 Palestine, as one of the areas removed from Turkish control, was mandated by the League of Nations to Great Britain, the mandate including a statement of the Balfour Declaration. But immigration proceeded slowly, if more quickly than before, since the native Arab population, supported by the surrounding Arab states and partaking of the new birth of nationalism that spread after World War I, resisted fiercely the acquisition of Palestinian land by the Jews. Nevertheless, through a world-wide organization, the Zionists were able to raise large funds with which to buy and improve, beyond anything the previous settlers of the land had been capable of, numerous tracts on which settlers from Europe (principally) and other parts of the world worked. Open fighting occurred several times between the world wars, and the influx of Jews from countries occupied by the Nazis after 1933 further exasperated feelings. At the end of World War II there was almost universal belief among the Jews of Europe, nearly annihilated by the Nazi policy of genocide, that Europe for them was no longer a practicable place to live. But their attempts to flee from the European continent were met by immigration quotas established throughout the world and especially in Palestine. Whole shiploads of Jews from Europe were halted at sea by the British and the would-be immigrants placed in concentration camps. To these measures the Zionists responded with resistance; fighting of the most vicious kind broke out in Palestine, and eventually appeal was made to the United Nations to attempt to settle a question international in scope. England had suggested plans for the partition of Palestine into Arab and Jewish states, and with some modification this was the solution offered by the United Nations. Britain withdrew from Palestine in 1948 and simultaneously the Jews of Palestine, in the climax to the quest for a nation of their own that went back for nearly two millennia, established the state of Israel.

He had a distinguished military career in World War I, and served briefly (1934-35) as minister of war.

Žižka (zhish'kā), John. [Also, John Ziska.] b. at Troznov, near České Budějovice (Budweis), in Bohemia, c1360; d. at the siege of Pribyslav, in Bohemia, Oct. 11, 1424. Bohemian Hussite leader. He was a page at the court of King Wenceslaus, volunteered in the service of the Teutonic Knights, Hungarians, and English, and, a seasoned soldier, became the chief leader of the Hussites at the age of 60. He built the stronghold of Tábor, repelled (1420) the Imperialists from Prague (at a point now called Žižkov), gained many victories, although totally blind after 1421, over the Imperialists, especially at Havlíkův Brod, or Deutsch Brod (Jan. 8, 1422), and invaded Moravia and Austria. He led the Taborites against the Utraquists in the struggle that split the Hussites in 1423, and then set out on a combined expedition, after a truce was declared, into Moravia, on which mission he died of plague. He is the subject of an epic by Alfred Meissner. He is famous for his skill in tactics, having developed a peasant army (armed with such unconventional weapons as flails and cannon mounted on wagons from which they fired while in motion) into a highly efficient and mobile force.

Zog I (zōg). [Also: Zogu; original name, Ahmed Zogu (or Zogolli).] b. at Bugajet, Albania (then part of Turkey), 1895—. King of Albania (1928-46). An influential Albanian chieftain before and during World War I, he was president (1925-28) and thereafter king (1928-46) of Albania. He was a member (1920-24) of the Albanian cabinet (premier, 1922-24), and overthrew (1924) the regime of Fan Stylian Noli. He married (1938) Countess Geraldine Apponyi, by whom he had one son, Skander, born in 1939. Zog's close collaboration with Italy made Albania virtually an Italian protectorate, and he went into exile (April, 1939) following Italian occupation of Albania when Victor Emmanuel III became king of Albania as well as of Italy. He was deposed (1946) in absentia by the Communist regime and a republic was declared.

Zogbaum (zōg'bōm), Rufus Fairchild. b. at Charleston, S.C., Aug. 28, 1849; d. Oct. 22, 1925. American artist and writer. He was best known as a delineator of military and naval subjects. Zohar (zō'här). [Also: Sepher-haz-Zohar, Sohar; Eng. trans., "Book of Splendor" or "Book of Light."] Cabalistic work in the form of a commentary on the Pentateuch. It is ascribed traditionally to the 2nd century A.D., but by many is thought to have been written much later, probably in the 13th century.

Zoilus (zō'ī.lus). fl. in the 4th century B.C. Greek rhetorician; called Homeromastix (Scourge of Homer) from his severe criticisms of Homer, whose works had too much of the fabulous for Zoilus's taste. His name came to be applied to any carping critic.

Zola (zō'la, zō'lā'; French, zola), Émile. b. at Paris, April 2, 1840; d. there, Sept. 29, 1902. French novelist. He studied at the Lycée Saint-Louis, but took no degree. From 1860 to 1862 he lived in great poverty, and finally entered Hachette's bookstore as a packing clerk. He studied the details of publishing until the close of the year 1865, but devoted to writing all the time that was his own. In 1864 he published his first work, Contes à Ninon, followed in 1874 by the Nouveaux contes à Ninon. In 1865 appeared La Confession de Claude, and then other separate novels, as Le Venu d'une morte (1866), Les Mystères de Marseille (1867), Thérèse Raquin (1867), and Madeleine Féral (1868); he also published a number of short stories (1882-84). From 1871 to 1893 Zola published, under the collective title Les Rougon-Macquart, 20 novels: La Fortune des Rougons (1871), La Curée (1872), Le Ventre de Paris (1873), La Conquête de Plassans (1874), La Faute de l'abbé Mouret (1875), Son excellence Eugène Rougon (1876), L'Assommoir (1877), Une Page d'amour (1878), Nana (1880), Pot-Bouille (1882), Au bonheur des dames (1883), La Joie de vivre (1884), Germinal (1885), L'Œuvre (1886), La Terre (1887), Le Rêve (1888), La Bête humaine (1890), L'Argent (1891), La Débâcle (1892), and Le Docteur Pascal (1893). His Trilogy of the Three Cities includes Louardes (1894), Rome (1896), and Paris (1898). His writings in criticism include Mes haines (1866), Mon salon (1866), Édouard Manet (1867), La République française et la littérature (1879), Le Roman expérimental (1880), Le Naturalisme au théâtre (1881), Nos auteurs dramatiques (1881), Les Romanciers naturalistes (1881), Une Campagne (1881), and Documents littéraires, études et portraits (1881). Some of his novels have been dramatized, as L'Assommoir (1879), Le Ventre de Paris (1887), Renée (1887; adapted from La Curée), and Germinal (1888). Zola became the leader of the school of naturalism in France, bringing to his novels a minuteness of description that balked at nothing in an effort to build up an accurate picture of the life of his time. He was anticlerical, antimanagerial, and antimilitary in the crises that shook France in the 1890's. On Feb. 23, 1898, he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and the payment of a fine of 3,000 francs for libeling the court-martial which tried and acquitted Major Esterhazy in the Dreyfus affair. The newspaper article which brought the libel proceedings was J'accuse, written in the form of a letter which appeared (Jan. 13, 1898) in the Parisian journal Aurore. The sentence was annulled by the court of cassation. He was again tried and sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment and the payment of a fine. He left France for England before notification of judgment in order to secure a retrial later, but soon returned.

Zoroaster (zō.rō.sā'tēr). [Greek form of the Persian name Zarathushtra or Zarathustra.] fl. probably in the 6th century B.C. Ancient Iranian religious reformer, founder of Zoroastrianism. Nothing definite is known of his life; 660-583 are the dates most usually given for his birth and death, but 630, 570, or even 1000 B.C. are also given as his birth date. He is said to have converted to his belief, when he was in his 40's, King Vishtaspa, who is usually identified with Hystaspes, the father of Darius the Great. All tradition, by which his birth is placed in western or in eastern Iran, which tells of his career, or concerning his death, is much later and appears to have been modified by sectarian differences or by the simple passage of time. His own extant writing, if any, is preserved in the Gathas, hymns appearing in the Avesta. Zoroaster, objecting to the multiplicity of gods carried into Iran by the Aryan migrants from India, conceived of the universe as consisting of two opposing principles: one, personified as Ahura Mazda (Ormuzd), was the essence of good; the other was the essence of evil. Everything in the universe partakes of the fight between the two and it is the duty of man, for his own salvation and to secure increase of crops and cattle, to oppose the evil and hold to the good. The reformer was unable to eliminate polytheism, but the subordination of the numerous gods to the dual principle tended to establish belief in one supreme being; the nature gods were enrolled on the side of good as archangels (Amesha Spentas), the demons (daevas) aided the evil. Certain substances, such as fire, earth, and water, are pure; the belief that Zoroastrians are fire-worshippers is widespread but springs from the erroneous conclusion that fire is worshiped, whereas it is rather venerated as a manifestation of good emanating from Ahura Mazda. In the final judgment, all souls will be tried and the forces of evil will be defeated; the good will thereafter reign triumphant, Ahura Mazda having conquered with their aid. Much of this is later addition to Zoroaster's basic doctrine, the Magi, priests of Zoroastrianism, having molded the religion during its spread throughout the Near East and transformed it from a pure doctrine of good and evil to a religious system known as Mazdaism. Between the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great (330 B.C.) and the advent of the Sassanid kings in the 3rd century A.D., the religion seems to have been dormant, except for the mystical offshoot known as Mithraism which spread through the Roman world. After several centuries of refluency under the Sassanids, Zoroastrianism was subdued by the spread of Mohammedanism, a crusading religion that overran Persia in the 7th century, and, though a number of worshippers remain in Iran, the principal existing center of Zoroastrianism is among the Parsis of India, whither it was carried by refugees from Islam.

Zoroastrians (zō.rō.sā'tri.anz). Followers of Zoroaster, now represented by the Ghebers and Parsis of Iran and India.

Zorrilla (thōr.rē'lyā), Manuel Ruiz. See Zorrilla or Zorrilla, Manuel Ruiz.

Zulu (zō'lo). [Also: Amazoele, Amazulu.] Bantu-speaking people of the northern Nguni group of S Africa, inhabiting Natal, S Transvaal, and S Orange Free State in the Union of South Africa. Their population has been estimated at two million (by D. McK. Malcolm, "The Zulu," in The Bantu Tribes of South Africa, edited by A. M. Duggan-Cronin, 1938). The name Zulu is taken from the name of the royal clan and the clan of King Shaka, who ruled from 1816 to 1828. Shaka's remarkable military exploits established the great Zulu empire which was defeated by the British in 1880 and divided into 13 kingdoms. Since that time these kingdoms have disintegrated into more than 200 independent Zulu tribes, each known by the name of the patrilineal clan of its chief. Zulu age grades were organized into military regiments by King Shaka, who also abolished circumcision. The Zulu practice cattle herding, with the cattle complex, and hoe agriculture. Their principal foods are milk, maize ("mealies"), and sorghum ("Kafir corn").

¹ Became emperor of Germany in 1871; he and his two successors were called both emperor of Germany and king of Prussia.

² Legendary or historically doubtful; dates are traditional.

³ Son of Gordianus I; proclaimed in Africa.

⁴ Proclaimed by the senate.

⁵ At the end of the joint reign of Galerius and Constantius (d. 306), a struggle broke out among their sons and their Caesars (lieutenants trained to succeed their Augusti) which was resolved finally by death and battle, Constantine ruling alone after the defeat (323) and death (324) of Licinius.

BONAPARTE

Joseph Bonaparte	1808-13
------------------	---------

¹ Equivalent to the premiership; actual power rests in the Communist Party, which was headed by Lenin until his death in 1924 and by Stalin from 1928 to 1953.

² Established in 1922.

³ King of the Hejaz and of the Nejd 1927-32.

⁴ Became king of England as James I in 1603, uniting Scotland and England in the kingdom of Great Britain.

⁵ Son of Karageorge, who led the first revolt of the Serbs against Turkish rule in the years 1804-13 and who obtained some recognition as leader of the Serbs. He was murdered in 1817 by Obrenovich partisans.

⁶ Again succeeded his father as in 1830.

⁷ Navarre and Castile were united in 1028, and León was added to these in 1037. The marriage (1469) of Ferdinand II of Aragon (who became Ferdinand V of Castile) and Isabella of Castile united the two remaining kingdoms; Spain became one country on Ferdinand's victory (1479) over rival claimants for the throne of Castile.

⁸ Juana acceded to the throne of Castile in 1501 when Isabella died; Ferdinand's regency was challenged by Juana's husband Philip, but Philip died and Juana became insane, leaving Ferdinand to rule.

⁹ Charles V of the Holy Roman Empire, 1519-50.

¹ Born posthumously; regency of Maria Christina, queen mother, 1886-1902; went into exile in 1931.

² By a law of the Cortes of 1947, Spain is a monarchy in which Franco rules as chief of state, but his successor is to be a person of royal blood.

³ Expelled and restored twice before his death in 1470. The Swedish resistance to the union under the Danish kings was maintained until 1523, notably by the Sture family, who acted as "protectors" of the kingdom against what was considered foreign usurpation.

⁴ Elected crown prince 1810 and adopted by Charles XIII.

⁵ The Seljuk empire was divided after the death of Malik.

¹ See complete chart on the end sheets at the back of Volume III.² Before 1804, when the election procedure was modified by the Twelfth Amendment, each elector voted for two candidates for the presidency; the candidate with the highest number of votes became president, and the one with the next highest became vice-president.³ Jefferson was elected president by vote in the House of Representatives, ten states to four, Burr becoming vice-president.⁴ No candidate having received a majority of the electoral vote, the election was decided in the House of Representatives, where, on Feb. 9, 1825, 13 states voted for Adams, seven for Jackson, and four for Crawford.⁵ Horace Greeley, the Democratic and Liberal Republican candidate, received 66 electoral votes, but died Nov. 29, 1872, before the Electoral College met; his votes were split among four candidates.⁶ A special electoral commission gave all (22) disputed votes to Hayes.

GEOLOGICAL TABLE

Eras and Periods	Probable Approximate Duration in Millions of Years	Principal Evolutionary Events
Pre-Cambrian or Archean Era
Azoic	1,000	Formation of the earth. No life.
Archeozoic	800	One-celled plants and animals in the sea (no fossil record).
Proterozoic	650	Beginnings of complex forms of life in the sea: sea worms and the like.
Paleozoic or Primary Era
Cambrian	105	Proliferation of trilobites and other invertebrate forms, sea animals with shells.
Ordovician	70	Appearance of fish, the first vertebrates.
Silurian	25	First life on land: land invertebrates and land plants.
Devonian (Old Red Sandstone)	35	The age of fishes. Centipedes, probable first appearance of insects.
Carboniferous		Amphibians, reptiles, insects, proliferation of centipedes and other myriapods.
Mississippian	35	First land vertebrates.
Pennsylvanian	45	Coal-forming vegetation in swamps, first conifers, rise of reptiles.
Permian	35	End of trilobites. Spread of reptiles.
Mesozoic or Secondary Era
Triassic	32	The age of the dinosaurs. Much volcanic activity. First, smaller dinosaurs, pterodactyls, first mammals.
Jurassic	38	Great dinosaurs, first modern (decapod) crustaceans, first birds.
Cretaceous	70	Armored dinosaurs, deciduous trees, first flowering plants. End of the dinosaurs.
Cenozoic or Tertiary Era
Paleocene	5	Beginning of the spread of warm-blooded, hairy animals.
Eocene	15	Large land animals, ancestral horses.
Oligocene	10	Ancestors of the elephant.
Miocene	18	Primates.
Pliocene	12	Spread of camels, horses, and other large mammals.
Quaternary Era (Sometimes considered as part of the Cenozoic.)
Pleistocene	2	The Ice Age. Appearance of man.
Recent	.025	Spread of modern man.
